Speech of Gen. Butler at Gloucester on the Presidential Election—What He Thinks of Greeley.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

GLOUCESTER, Mass., July 13.—The Republicans of Gloucester raised a Grant and Wilson flag to-night, and afterward listened to an address from Gen. Butler. The Town Hall was crowded to excess. He began his address with a reference to the war, the results of which were three-fold. First it was a settled question that the United States was a nation composed of various States with rights, but with no rights paramount to the General Government; second, that there was no man on American soil who should address another as master or who should be addressed as slave; and third, that as it burdened the country with an immense debt, it would have been wonderful if there had not been a great percentage of loss in the collection of immense sums of money and the growling of dissatisfied people, he dispensed with by declaring in relation to this that the actual defalcation under Gen. Spinner's administration amounted to one-tenth thousand of one per cent. This dissatisfaction recently manifested with regard to the Administration he declared originated in New-York last November with the disappointed office-seekers. No charge has been made against Grant; that he is dishonest; the only thing said is that his appointments to office were not made with greater regard to the feelings of all seeking to fill them. It was absurd to charge him with putting his relatives in office, for of the thirty-thousand offices, only thirteen of them were held by members of his family. The General said he had some difficulty with office-seekers as well as Grant, and charges had been made against him of having committed misdeeds. Mr. Greeley, he said, of all men on earth, has been a most persistent office-seeker for the past thirty years, as his letters published over his own signature to Mr. Seward would show, in which he said he dissolved partnership with Seward and Thurlow Weed, because he did not get his full share of offices. After referring to what the Thirty-third and Forty-second Congresses had done in the reduction of taxation, the speaker said he was glad Greeley had been nominated, for not only was his defeat now certain, but there was to be a good square fight between the Democrats of the war—not those of older date, for he—and the Republicans. For his own part he could not indorse all the language Greeley had applied to the Democratic Party, for he believed there were as good Democrats as Republicans; that he wanted to show by repeating Greeley's own words what manner necessarily of the Democratic Party it was that he when it took for its standard-bearer its avowed enemy. The General then repeated a great portion of his recent speech in Faneuil Hall about payments that would be made to the South if Greeley was put in the White House, and referred at length to the Kuklux and the secret committee by them. It was then conspiracy, he said, that Gen. Forrest invited Union soldiers to join hands with and hurrah for Greeley, and wear white hats and black hearts at the same time. That was an entertainment to which we were invited, but he did not propose to sit at the table, and he knew of no Republican, he said, of Democratic who would not, he believed. No one would but disappointed office-seekers. Gen. Butler took up the charges of corruption made against the Government, seriatim, paying particular attention to the French arms investigation. He held that the Republican Party had been in power as long as it ought to be if only for the interests of the country did not require it until peace should reign within our borders. It had carried the country safely through a tremendous struggle, had emancipated 4,000,000 of human beings, and had given to the country twelve years of prosperity, the like of which had never been seen. Until the work of the war was done, and the issues of the war were all over, it must not lose its place. They said that Greeley had been put up to catch the negro vote, but he made safe to say that the negro knew too well what he was about to do anything of the sort unless a pistol was held to their breasts, and they were compelled to do it. In conclusion he hoped no one would be frightened by the noise that the Greeley men made, and that they would not be cajoled by talk of the great and good Horace. His only fear had been that the editor of the Tribune would not be nominated at Baltimore, but that fact of their having done so made him more than hopeful for the issue in November. He expressed his intention of speaking again shortly on local political differences, and retired amid much applause. Gen. Osborne, of Illinois, followed, saying that Illinois greeted Massachusetts, and that she would much better with fifty thousand majority for Grant, and would then go her twenty thousand better, a statement that was received with the wildest applause.

DISASTROUS FIRES.

The Business Portion of the Town of Alpena, Mich., Burned—Four Lives Lost.

DETROIT, Mich., July 13.—A disastrous fire occurred at Alpena, Mich., last night, and it is reported that several lives were lost. Among the buildings burned were the Sherman House, Burrell House, Union Hotel, Huron House, Eagle Hotel, Goodrich's jewelry-store, Dow & Gardner's general store, Potter Brothers' hardware-store, C. C. Whitney's drug store, A. Auspoek's dry-goods store, Power & Co.'s grocery, Albert's furniture store, the County Clerk's office, Albert Pock's residence and office, several boarding-houses and residences. None of the mills or lumber-yards were burned.

LATER.—Four men perished in the fire in Alpena, Mich., last night, and two more were injured beyond recovery. The total amount of insurance is about $100,000.

Latest Particulars.

DETROIT, Mich., July 13.—Last night's fire at Alpena was one of the most disastrous. Being entirely a lumber manufacturing place, the buildings were naturally built all of frame, and although the town possesses a steam fire engine, all efforts to stay the progress of the flames were unavailing until they had swept away three and a half blocks of the business portion of the town. The most lamentable part of the disaster is the loss of life. Mrs. Westbrook perished in the street in front of her store, George, her son, white endeavoring to save his mother, also perished in the flames. The dead bodies of two men were found in the ruins to-day. A sailor named Kolin and G. H. Westby were badly injured. The losses, as far as computed, foot up $188,000; insured for about $70,000.

Fire in the Northern Michigan Prisons.

MICHIGAN CITY, Ind., July 13.—The west shop, 300 by 40 feet, of the Northern Prison at Michigan City, has just been burned by fire, supposed to have been originated from sparks from a chimney lodging in the gutter and communicating with the roof. This was the largest shop of the prison, in which were working about one hundred men. The contractors, Ford, Johnson & Co., will lose from $60,000 to $80,000. The loss of the State will be about $12,000. The State has no insurance; Ford, Johnson & Co. are insured for $17,000. Some of the prisoners escaped.

TENNESSEE.

The Baltimore Ratification Meeting at Knoxville a Fiasco.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., July 12.—After three days of preparation the Greeley ratification meeting to-night has turned out a huge fiasco. There were not over 300 persons present. The music, fire-works and speaking failed to gather a crowd. There was no enthusiasm, and no one who could be called a Liberal Republican attended. The Democrats were decidedly discouraged, and the Republicans are only the more united by the failure of their opponents.

BANK ROBBERY.

Bold Action of Burglars in Uxbridge, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., July 13.—The residence of E. W. Hayward, Cashier of the Blackstone National Bank, at Uxbridge, Mass., was entered this morning, between the hours of 1 and 3, through a chamber window, by five disguised men, who, after binding and gagging Mr. Hayward and family, numbering four persons, entered the room of Chas. Wesson, the Teller of the bank, and compelled him to accompany them to the bank and unlock the safe. They obtained between $13,000 and $14,000, mostly in bills. The robbers then locked the safe and bank, took the cellar back to his room, unmasked the whole family, and drank some water to drunk, separated them and went away. The condition of the family was discovered about daylight, but the robbers had left no clue as to the manner of their departure. A satchel, containing fuses, powder and burglars' implements, was found near the bank this morning.

BRUTAL MURDER.

A Man Shoots a Boy for Bathing Near His House.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., July 13.—Last evening, while a party of boys were bathing in the river, below the foot of Beale-street, a private watchman named Sturgeon, employed to take charge of some flat boats near at hand, came out on the roof of his dwelling, armed with a musket, and followed by his wife, who was armed with a revolver. After threatening the boys for bathing there, Sturgeon took deliberate aim at one of them, named John Murphy, who was in the water, and fired three times, inflicting him in the head, killing him instantly. Immediately after shooting, Sturgeon jumped into a skiff and made his escape. His wife was arrested and lodged in the Station-house. They came here recently from St. Louis, and are represented as bad characters. A Coroner's jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against Sturgeon.

FRANCE.

Movements of the American Minister—Increase in Taxation.

PARIS, July 13.—Hon. E. B. Washburne, the American Minister to France, has gone to Boulogne, where he purposes remaining a few days.

The proposition of M. Gaslonde, which created such an excited debate in the National Assembly yesterday, was to increase the rate of taxation on licenses, doors, windows and furniture. The subject came up again during the session of the Assembly today, and, after debate, that part of the proposal increasing the tax on licenses was adopted, but the other portion increasing the tax on doors, windows and furniture was rejected.

THE HAVRE REGATTA.

Withdrawal of the Larne Boats—Quick Time Made by the Sappho Over the Course.

HAVRE, July 13.—The Havre regatta took place yesterday. Twelve boats started. Twenty hours was the time allotted for the race. It was expected that the Guinevre, Livonia and Sappho would sail, but the Guinevre was withdrawn, and consequently the Sappho was withdrawn also, because the Livonia was the only large schooner entered, and Mr. Douglass would not sail with Ashbury as the only competitor. The boats started at 4 o'clock. The Sappho started fifteen minutes afterward, ran to the leeward of the fleet, crossing the bows of the Livonia, and returned to the anchorage an hour and a half ahead of her.

Condition of the Wheat and Cotton Crops in the South-west.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., July 13.—Much of the wheat crop just harvested has been injured by continued and untimely rains. Some injury has also been done to the growing cotton crops in Middle and West Tennessee and North Alabama, the rains causing the shedding of the bolls. The planters entertain serious apprehensions of the effects of the heavy rains today.

The Lost Child Freddie Lich Found.

PHILADELPHIA, July 13.—A child answering the description of Freddie Lich, who was stolen from Quincy, Ill., more than a year ago, was seen with a travelling musician in Columbia, last week, and went from Marietta, on Monday, for Harrisburg, Penn.

Disgraceful Action of a Policeman in the City of Hackensack.

PHILADELPHIA, July 13.—Michael O'Connor, a policeman, was today committed to prison to await the result of injuries inflicted on a colored man named John H. Weaver. It seems that the officer surprised a female member of the colored women, and Weaver, coming up, he pulled out his revolver and fired at him, the ball taking effect in the upper part of the abdomen, on the left side, inflicting a dangerous wound. O'Connor is said to have been under the influence of liquor at the time.

THE WEATHER.

Events and Probabilities.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 13—7 P. M.—The barometer has risen from Lake Michigan to New-England, and from the latter to Eastern North Carolina. It has fallen over the Northwest, where fresh to brisk easterly to southerly winds and clear and partly cloudy weather is now prevailing. Clear and partly cloudy weather is now generally reported from Wisconsin and Illinois to New-England, with light to fresh winds. Partly cloudy weather and areas of rain from New-Jersey southward to Pennsylvania, with southerly winds to Tennessee, Alabama, and Florida; with easterly to southerly winds. Westerly winds and clear weather from Mississippi westward. The temperature has fallen somewhat over New-England and Northern New-York. Thermometers have risen at Leavenworth and St. Louis, but fallen at Shreveport, Memphis, and Omaha, and Cincinnati.

PROBABILITIES.

Falling barometer, fresh to brisk easterly to southerly winds, increasing cloudiness, and probably rain, will prevail on Sunday over the North-west, and extend eastward to Michigan and Indiana. Clear and partly cloudy weather, and easterly to southerly winds, for the New-England and Middle States and Ohio. Easterly to southerly winds, partly cloudy weather, and areas of rain, from the South Atlantic coast and Florida to Kentucky. Westerly winds and pleasant weather west of Alabama.

SARATOGA.

Brilliant Inauguration of the July Race Meeting.

The McDaniel Stable Again in the Ascendant.

Joe Daniels Wins the Travers Stake, and Harry Bassett the Sweepstake—Hampton and Tom Bowling also Victorious.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

SARATOGA, July 13.—Never was a race meeting blessed with a more glorious morning than that which dawned on the first day of these Saratoga races. A cloudless sky and a cool, refreshing breeze—what would the race-going world wish for in addition? Saratoga was early astir; even the visitors breakfasted long before their usual hour, and the morning train from Albany brought a crowd of people, many of whom could hardly find standing-room in the Hudson River cars. At least 300 had to sleep on chairs or on the floor in the steamer, and how many were unable to get breakfast at the Delavan House, I had no time to estimate. But long before 12 o'clock they were all on the race-track, and the grand stand was crowded with an unusual number of ladies for the first Saratoga meeting.

Racing at Saratoga has one disadvantage as compared with Jerome Park. One misses the lovely drives through the Central Park, and the gay scene of Harlem-lane. Here the course is so near to the village that there is no opportunity for the display of drags and elegant carriages. There is, too, no club-house, with luxurious arrangements to tempt the thousands of the aristocratic ladies who honor Jerome Park with their fair presence. Still the Saratoga race meetings are always in favor and always fashionably attended.

The racing today has been excellent. The first race, the Travers Stakes, brought out such horses as Joe Daniels, Meteor, Wade Hampton and Gray Planet. Joe Daniels and Wade Hampton were the favorites at Dr. Underwood's popular temple. Eleven horses started, but the betting was confined to these horses. Joe Daniels showed in the front till they came down the quarter-stretch, when Wade Hampton and Silent Friend (an outsider) came up with him. The moment was exciting. As I glanced around I saw many grave faces, some few pale and with colorless lips. Every one was intense and excited.

Down the stretch they came, amid cries of "Sit down," "Daniels wins," "Wade Hampton's beat," "Where's Meteor?" &c. There was a scrambling, rushing, blending sound on the track; nine colors flashed momentarily past. Col. McDaniel rushed up the course to shout some order to his jockey. The horses for a second were half enveloped in a cloud of dust; one deep, prolonged roar burst from the assembled multitude and Joe Daniels went under the cord the winner of the Travers Stakes.

As though determined either to recover their losses or win more, the crowd of speculators, after a hurried visit to the refreshment saloon, again surrounded Dr. Underwood to invest in the Sweepstakes. Again the pool selling became lively, for the stables of John Harper and Col. McDaniel were to be represented by Harry Bassett and Lyttleton. Harry Bassett was decidedly the favorite, but there were many who thought—perhaps the wish was father to the thought—that even Lyttleton might beat the great chestnut colt. As far as I could judge it was a foregone conclusion. Lyttleton was in a thorough sweat, and had to be scraped off when he was brought on the track. Moreover, he was fidgety and exceedingly restless. He never had a chance. As the four horses in the race passed along the outer stretch of the course, John Morrissey, who was lounging against the inside of the track-fence, remarked coolly: "Bassett's a different horse to what he was at the Branch. He's running fifty per cent better." Mr. Morrissey was right. Round the corner they came, Bassett between Lyttleton and Mr. Belmont's mare, Victoria. But Lyttleton and the mare soon wanted the whip to keep them up, and when about eighty yards from home, Bassett sprang away from them, and won easily, his jockey's hands down. There was a shout of congratulation to Col. McDaniel, and many inquiries were made as to what the betting was about Tuesday's race between Bassett and Longfellow. The return match between these heroes of the turf bids fair to distract a good many from their Sunday prayers, if not to spoil a night's rest for them. Many remarks were made about Lyttleton's running; the best he could do being to make a dead heat for the second place with Mr. Belmont's mare Victoria. Ortolan, the fourth horse, ran away with his jockey at the start, and was out of the race from the beginning.

The third race, the Flash Stakes for two-year-old colts and fillies, brought out a field of eleven, the knowing ones, apparently, hardly knowing what to do; some favoring Mr. McGrath's Tom Bowling, others having an idea that Mr. Belmont's stable would carry away the prize. Several of the youngsters showed a strong indisposition to face their horses, and a succession of false starts was the result. But they at last got away, rather like a pack of school-boys; and the distance only being half a mile, the race was, of course, fast. The race was won easily by Tom Bowling in 50½ seconds. The last race was a time race, the winner to receive $1,500 if run in one minute forty-one seconds, and $1,000 if in one minute forty seconds. The race was won by Kingfisher. Every one agrees in pronouncing the opening day of the meeting a great success, and nearly every one in congratulating Col. McDaniel on winning the two principal races, though they, combined, cannot compensate him for his disastrous defeat at Long Branch.

THE RACING.

The inauguration of the meeting was a great success in a racing point of view. The track was in excellent order. The first race was the Travers Stakes for three-year-olds, for which there were nine starters, and Col. McDaniel won it with Joe Daniels. The betting men were somewhat bewildered, and laid their money cautiously, as the stakes were scotched in the fire at Long Branch, and they did not care for a like participation a second time. The time of Joe Daniels beats that heretofore made in the stakes, and one prediction was verified that he would be made to run almost of all his predecessors' time. The first quarter of the race was run in 1:12, and the mile-post stood to stand in 1:48¾. The following are the particulars of the racing:

THE TRAVERS STAKES.

The games began with one of the most important events of the meeting, and of the year, viz.: The Travers Stakes for three-year-olds, $50 entrance, play or pay, with $1,500 added in money and $250 in plate given by the President of the association, after whom the stake is named. The Stake this year was an exceptionally heavy one in value, there being eighty-one entries, and the value to the winner $6,350. The Stake was instituted at the Spring meeting of the race in 1864, in line the last Jerome Park race was won by Kentucky, the mighty son of Lexington. There were more than thirty subscribers and five starters, and the time was 2:16¾. In 1868 Capt. T. G. Moore won the stake with Malden, a daughter of Lexington, there being thirty-nine subscribers and seven starters. He won the race in 2:17¾. In line the last R. A. Alexander brought out Merrill, also a son of the blind hero of Woodburn, and beat a field of five starters, out of forty-one entries, in 2:20. Mr. Francis Morris captured the prize in 1869 with his flying filly, Ruthless, by imp. Eclipse, who ran the Travers in 2:18¾, beating two opponents and carrying three and 5 pounds over her proper weight. In 1871 it fell to the fortune of Col. Jas. J. O'Fallon, of St. Louis, to win the stake with the Bonnie, by Lexington. Eight horses started, and she won in the fastest time it was ever run in, viz., 2:16¾. In 1869 August Belmont's imported horse Glenelg, by Citadel, won it against a couple of contestants, in 2:18. This was the first time it was run with 110 pounds up, the weight in the previous years being 100 pounds, with the usual allowances to fillies and geldings. In 1870 Dan Swigert brought Kingfisher, by Lexington, from the blue grass of "Old Kentucky," and won the race against eleven contestants, in 2:17¾. Last year Mr. Daniel Swigert came 300 miles with Harry Bassett, and won it nearly from a field of seven, in 2:18¾. The race of today was the eighth for this stake, and it brought out so good a field of contestants that it was a very difficult matter for the stewards, further on to express a decided opinion as to its result. The "Sweepstakes" were announced as follows, viz.: J. W. Pennoyer's b. c. (brother to James A. Connolly) by Vandal, out of Magnesia, by imp. Margrave; Wm. Jennings's ch. c. Silent Friend, by imp. Australian, dam by Lexington; A. Belmont's b. c. Wade Hampton, by Lexington, out of Charmante; same by Alarmed; dam Cleopatra; D. McDaniel's ch. c. Joe Daniels, by imp. Australian, out of Belly Carter, by imp Glencoe; J. A. Grunstead's (John Morrissey's) b. c. Generic, by Lightning out of Sister to Euric, by imp. Sovereign; B. G. Thomas' b. c. War Jig, by War Dance, out of Dixie, (Herod's dam,) by imp. Sovereign; A. Belmont's br. c. Gray Planet, by Planet, out of Eagles, by imp. Glencoe, and D. E. Harness' ch. c. Meteor, by Asteroid, out of Maria Inna, by imp. Yorkshire. Never did we see so much of doubt and fear so governed the speculation on the probable result. Joe Daniels had beaten Meteor in the Belmont, and the latter returned the compliment by defeating his former victor in the Jersey Derby. Then again there was Belmont's pair, Wade Hampton and Gray Planet, to fright on the knowing ones, and Pennoyer added to the perplexities of the situation by starting the brother to James A. Connolly, for those who remembered the performance of the latter led to the belief that he might "live again" in the form of his brother. Thus it was that the night before the race that Belmont, Harness and McDaniel alternately ruled as the favorite, but just previous to the race the quotations settled as follows:

McDaniel	$400	$200	$200	$400
Wade Hampton	240	100	215	230
Belmont	240	230	230	225
Thomas	65	50	50	50
Field	45	30	75	20
Total	$1,250	$610	$1,270	$925

When the bugle sounded J. W. Hunt Reynolds' ch. f. Elsie, by Bonnie Scotland, out of the Grande Duchesse, by Lexington, joined the starters.

THE RACE.

The distance being a mile and three-quarters they were started on the extra or three-quarter stretch, and the group readily faced the starter. After one false start the flag fell, and Elsie went off in the lead, with War Jig second, Gray Planet a third, Silent Friend and Meteor fifth, the others in a rush. As they rushed down the stretch Elsie went away and, when they entered on the regular stretch, at the half-mile pole, she had four lengths, Gray Planet second, Silent Friend third, War Jig fourth, and Brother to Connolly fifth. As they came round the lower turn Wade Hampton made the best of his way in the rear and shot up to the third place, and when they reached the three-quarter pole he passed Gray Planet and assumed the second place. When they turned into and came up the homestretch the whole field were up in a bunch, and a magnificent spurt ensued, Wade Hampton and Silent Friend stand in that manner. Elsie was slightly in front, Gray Planet having his neck ahead of Wade Hampton. When they went to the turn Wade Hampton began to make the running, and passing Gray Planet was soon in the second position, Silent Friend then came up and took the third position from Planet. When they passed the quarter-pole their positions were as follows: Elsie first, Wade Hampton second, Gray Planet third, Brother to Connolly fourth, and Silent Friend fifth. As they went down the back stretch, Joe Daniels, who had been waiting behind, now left the rear to, and when Wade Hampton took the lead, he followed him up, and passed him into second place. At the half-mile pole Wade Hampton still led, with Joe Daniels second, Meteor third, and Silent Friend fourth. On the tower Joe Daniels passed Hampton, and kept the lead round to the homestretch, when Wade Hampton gave way, and Silent Friend came to the second place, but his efforts to catch Daniels was without avail, the latter winning easily by two lengths, in the fastest time the stake was ever run in, viz.: 2:08¾; Silent Friend was second, two lengths ahead of Wade Hampton; Meteor fourth, Elsie fifth, Gray Planet sixth, War Jig seventh, Generic eighth, and Brother to Connolly ninth. Thus McDaniel came to the front again, and regained the confidence of the speculators.

THE SWEEPSTAKES.

The second race of the day was a Sweepstakes of $50 each, play or pay, for all ages, $750 added, a mile and a quarter. Out of the seventeen nominations in the stake, there was a good proportion of starters, the following four sporting silk when the bugle summoned them to the fray: Carroll & Coars' br. h. Octolan, five years, by Doncaster, out of Canary Bird, by imp. Albion; Mr. McDaniel's ch. h. Harry Bassett, four years, by Lexington, out of Canary Bird; John Harper's br. h. Lyttleton, five years, by imp. Leamington, out of Fanny Holton, by Lexington; A. Belmont's ch. f. Victoria, three years, by Censor, out of imp. Camilla, by King Tom. McDaniel's was the favorite, as follows:

Harry Bassett	$400	$200	$450
Lyttleton	215	65
Victoria	85	30	100
Ortolan	15	10
Total	$715	$305	$550

McDaniel's pair were then left out of the pools, and the following were the figures for the second place:

Lyttleton	$600	$600	$110
Victoria	85	400	270
Ortolan	15	200	200
Total	$700	$1,200	$1,580

THE RACE.

They were started from the three-quarter pole and when the flag fell, Bassett went off first, with Lyttleton second, Ortolan third, and Victoria behind. When they came up the homestretch, Victoria passed Ortolan, and took the third place. Ortolan then came to his speed, and came up to the second place, while Lyttleton fell back behind Victoria. When they came past the stand, Harry Bassett was a length in front of Ortolan, with Victoria third, and Lyttleton fourth. As they went round the turn Bassett still leading a length, Ortolan maintaining his second place, while Lyttleton passed Victoria and took the third position. Sample then passed Lyttleton forward and was second when they reached the quarter-pole. At that point Bassett was leading his competitors a length and a half. Lyttleton second, a length ahead of Ortolan, who was half a length in advance of Victoria. Going along the homestretch Ortolan made play and was soon abreast of Lyttleton and running even with him. Bassett was still making the pace in the front and was nearly two lengths in the lead when they passed the half-mile post. Lyttleton there showed his neck in front of Victoria, who had passed Ortolan and was running third. When, midway between the lower turn Victoria made her run, and when the three-quarter pole was reached she was leading Lyttleton, while Ortolan was two or three lengths behind. Coming up the homestretch an admirable contest ensued, Lyttleton coming up and beating Victoria. Bassett still remained in front, and won the race by a length in 2:11¾. The contest for second place was a close one, and the judges declared a dead heat between Lyttleton and Victoria.

Time—2:11¾.

THE FLASH STAKES.

The third race to be decided was the Flash Stakes, for two-year-olds; $50 entrance, play or pay, with $600 added; half a mile. The stake is again named, for it is like a "flash in the pan." One start, a rush, and it is over. The stake is an important one so far as to form a guiding line to the probable roles of the Saratoga and Kentucky Stakes, both over longer distances, viz., three-quarters and a mile. In the stake there were twenty-nine entries, and eleven were marked upon the card as starters. These were Hunter & Travers' b. f. Luna, by Asteroid, out of Glenalbin, by imp. Glencoe; Also, ch. c. Saturn, by Planet, out of Jennie H., by J. Littell's ch. c. Reliverer, by imp. Australian, out of Erotica, by Lexington; F. Morris' ch. c. No. 8, by imp. Eclipse, out of Molly Jackson, by Vandal; H. P. McGrath's b. c. Tom Bowling, by Lexington, out of Lucy Fowler, by imp. Albion; A. Belmont's ch. f. Electra, by Kentucky, out of imp. Hermes, by Stockwell; also ch. f. Sulkstocking, by Kentucky, out of imp. Fluke; R. W. Walden's ch. f. Minnie W., by Planet, out of Edina, by imp. Knight of St. George; also, ch. c. by Planet, out of Service, by Lexington, and Odin Bowie's ch. c. Calvert, by Baltimore, out of Chickamauga, by Bonnie Laddie. Jackson.

The speculations were all at sea again, for save to anyone from such a lot was a conundrum solved only by the result. Minnie W. was fast, but always sadly fractious to the post, and usually from behind out of all chance of winning. Belmont's stable was known to be in good form, but his pair were untried, and Hunter & Travers' were conceded to be in the same fix. Morris' colt had proved himself a clipper, but they were afraid to trust even him. In fact there was very little choice, and the betting shifted from one to the other, until it finally settled before the race at the following prices:

McGrath	$100	$420
Belmont	220	110
Morris	110	80
McDaniel	110	80
Hunter & Travers, Littell, Walden, Boyle, The Field	200	400
Total	$750	$3,100

THE RACE.

They were started from the half-mile pole. As usual with two-year olds, they were very fractious, and half an hour was wasted in endeavoring to get them off. Cora Linn was first, Tom Bowling second, Minnie W. third and Saturn fourth. They remained in this position round the lower turn, and at the three-quarter pole Cora Linn was still leading, but on the homestretch Tom Bowling came to the front and won the race by two lengths, Silk-stocking second, Cora Linn third, Minnie W. fourth, Saturn fifth. Time, 50¾ seconds.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE STRANGE COUNTRY.

I have come from a mystical Land of Light
To a strange country;
The land I have left is forgotten quite
In the land I see.

The round earth rolls beneath my feet,
And the still stars glow;
The mysterious waters rise and retreat,
The winds come and go.

Sure as a heart-beat all things seem
In this strange country;
So sure, at night, it is part of a dream,
All things flow too.

It is life, all life, all sweet and plain,
In the sea and the flood,
In the beating heart, in the wondrous brain,
In the flesh and the blood.

Deep as death is the daily strife
Of this strange country;
All things move up till they blossom in life
And tremble and flee.

Nothing is stranger than the rest,
From the pole to the pole—
The world in the ditch, the egg in the nest,
The flesh and the soul.

Look in mine eyes, O man I meet
In this strange country!
Come to mine arms, O maiden sweet,
With thy mouth kiss me!

Why goes by with a frown on his brow?
King Solomon!
He is a stranger, too, I vow,
And must journey on!

O wondrous faces that up start
In this strange country!
O identities that become a part
Of my soul and me!

What are ye building so fast and fleet,
O humanities?
"We are building cities for those whose feet
Are coming behind.

Our stay is short; we must fly again
From this strange country;
But others are coming, women and men,
Eternality."

Ay, what art thou, and what am I,
But a breaking wave?
Rising and falling, with cry on cry
To the shore of the grave.

I have come from a mystical Land of Light
To this strange country;
This dawn I came; I shall go to-night;
Ay, me! ay, me!

I hold my hand to my head and stand
'Neath the air's blue arc;
I try to remember the mystical Land,
But all is dark.

And all around me swim shapes like mine,
In this strange country;
They speak in the glamour of gleams divine,
And they moan, "Ay, me!"

Like waves in the cold moon's silvern breath
They gather and roll—
Each fleet of white is a birth or a death,
Each sound is a soul.

O what is the Eye that gleams so bright
O'er this strange country?
It draws us alone with a chain of light,
As the Moon the Sea!

THE STORY OF FRANCOISE.

BY KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

I.

"I tell you, monsier, that the child must not be excited. Surely since this accursed war began there has been enough to disquiet us women; and now we are to have a rascally Prussian officer quartered on us, only because he is not strong enough to rough it with his soldiers. Ah oui!" Here Célestine threw back her broad head, and planted her hands firmly on his hips. "Monsieur, ma'm'selle is not strong either, though she has rosy cheeks and bright eyes."

Monsieur Serret raised his mild eyes to remonstrate with his old servant, but Célestine's attitude daunted him. She looked as firm as a rock. Her thick, black eyebrows seemed to bristle, and her long ear-rings to quiver with impatience. Her flat, broad face was redder than ever with indignation.

"I am busy," her master said. "You can go and mind the shop, Célestine."

Monsieur Serret was the book-seller of A——, and Célestine was his femme de charge—his housekeeper—and the foster-mother of his daughter Françoise.

Ever since he lost his wife—ten years ago—Monsieur Serret had been growing more and more reserved and abstracted. When he was not serving a customer, he was sure to be deep in some learned old book, both hands plunged in his long hair, deaf and insensible to all that went on around him.

Françoise had been brought up in a convent at Rouen. She had been at home a year now, and the house had brightened up under her gayety. She was wild and mischief-loving, but she was sweet and gentle too. Célestine said, "Ma'm'selle's frolics never come to faults;" but her aunt, Madame Viegron, shook her head.

"If my Victoire and my Adèle were to say the things you say, Françoise, I should tremble for their future."

The good, wooden-faced woman thought she did her duty by thus protesting, but her words acted as a spur to her niece's mischief, and gave mortal offense to Célestine.

It would have been wiser to consult Madame Viegron, the mother of a family, about the health of Françoise, instead of pouring out doubts and anxieties into the unwilling and preoccupied ears of Monsieur Serret; but Célestine could not forgive any one for finding fault with her young mistress. If she were to tell Madame Viegron of the strange symptoms which had so distressed her, she thought she should be providing the aunt with texts for fresh sermons.

"She will say, if Françoise faints, it is because she walks too far and too fast; and, 'No wonder her heart palpitates; she is always in a state of excitement.' Yes, yes, I know; and Madame Viegron will never see my child as she can be alone with those who love her. It is not possible she can love Madame, her aunt."

"Ma'm'selle—Ma'm'selle Françoise!" Célestine had gone upstairs when she left Monsieur Serret, and she stood at the top of the first flight, looking along the dark passage which led to Françoise's bed-room. There was not a bit of color here, even had there been light to show it. The boards, even, were stained a dark hue. The door at the end of the long narrow passage opened, and a sudden flood of sunshine poured in and lighted up the figure standing in the doorway. It is more true to say that Françoise looked like an embodiment of sunshine. Her bright brown eyes dancing with mirth, her small figure full of graceful movement at the disturbance in Célestine's face, she clapped her hands together and laughed out. Her hands were small and well shaped and dimpled; but they were more than these. Françoise never used them obtrusively, and yet they had the faculty of being singularly expressive, like all the rest of her, they were so full of eager, graceful life.

"You have not seen her face distinctly, because she has been standing against the light." She turns now, and leads Célestine into her room, and you see how delicate the color is on her transparent skin, and how bright the red on her parted lips.

"Tiens dear old worry!" she says, mischievously, and she pinches her nurse's arm. "What is the last misery? Has a cooing fallen in, or has Michon upset the pot-au-feu? or has thy friend the chef hanged himself in despair?"

"Ma'm'selle,"—Célestine blushes and her eyes go up in protest; she likes to be supposed to have an admirer, although she disclaims his admiration—"how often must I repeat that Monsieur Jules, of the Hôtel St. Barbe, is as indifferent to me as one of the deux colés? Et donc, ma'm'selle! But I have news, and news which will not please thee, dear chi d."

Célestine looked as doleful as possible. She wished to prevent her young lady from hearing the news suddenly, for she had remarked that any sudden excitement affected her strangely; but Françoise only laughed.

"Then art an old raven. Tell me this minute, or I will not stay to listen. Come, be quick, I tell thee."

"Ma'm'selle does not like the Prussians, n'est-ce pas? Is there a Frenchman that does not curse them in her heart? and Monsieur has but now told me that an officer—what do I know? it may be the old villain Meltke himself—is billeted on the house, and he may come at any moment, outside half of the court, will arrive, perhaps, directly."

The color flitted suddenly from the young bright face, and a look of woful [illegible] clouded her eyes.

"It is terrible!" she said. "Célestine, thou must arrange that I may never see him. It is too soon. I always see in every Prussian the murderer of my cousin Gustave."

"I will do the best I can, Ma'm'selle, and there is no time to lose."

She closed the door behind her and came slowly along the passage.

"Ah! it is terrible that books should make a nature so fearful," said Célestine, mending her black brows. "I would like to make a bonfire of Monsieur's books but in the yard there. He forgets everything, even the death of his brother's son, shot to death with German bullets; and such a sweet fair-faced lad, only sixteen. Ma foi! if he had lived he would have been a brother to Ma'm'selle; she would have had, indeed, some one to take care of her."

There was rather a hesitating knock at the door below, and Célestine hurried to open it, her sturdy sides shaking with the extra exertion as she went down stairs.

An officer in Prussian uniform stood at the door. He was so different from all Célestine's expectations that, in her stupor or surprise, she opened the door wide as to some honored visitor, and dropped a deep courtesy.

"This is the house of Monsieur Serret?" The officer spoke broken French, but his accent was pleasant, and his face so very winning that Célestine's anger melted like snow in sunshine.

"Ma foi, what bright blue eyes he has; and what a smile! Well, if Ma'm'selle should see him by chance, it is all the better that he is not an ogre."

The officer seemed weak and languid. He followed Célestine slowly upstairs, and when she ushered him into his room he sank on a chair exhausted.

He could not have made a better appeal to Célestine. Nursing was her special province, and to need her skill was irresistible. In a few minutes she had brought a cup of broth for her lodger, and had placed some pillows on his sofa.

"Ah, oui, M'sieur, we'll have you different looking in a week," she said, with a motherly glance at his pale face.

Célestine was carefully and fairly discreet, but that night, when she was helping Françoise to undress, her tongue got the better of her discretion.

"Ma'm'selle, the Prussian is much better than I thought. He is not even ugly; he has blue eyes and a fair mustache and a charming smile."

Françoise turned round with a grave surprised face.

"Célestine, I do not wish to hear of this person or to see him. It is a sufficient humiliation that my father, a true Frenchman, must tolerate in his house one of the invaders."

Célestine muttered, as she opened the doors of the tall armoire and laid her young mistress's gown smoothly on one of the empty shelves:

"Ah oui, vieille bavarde!—that thy foolish tongue must utter folly. It is not to be supported."

Meanwhile Adolphe von Holst congratulated himself.

"It is so pleasant and quiet here," he said; "no smell of beer and stale tobacco. I shall be able to read without disturbance."

Next day he met Monsieur Serret as he went out after dinner with a book in his hand.

"Monsieur is fond of reading!" said the book-seller. "We have plenty of books here to lend to Monsieur."

Adolphe von Holst bowed. His pleasant refined face had ingratiated him at once with his host.

"It seems to me (he spoke with much deference) that I give more trouble in your house, Monsieur, than is needful. I am quite willing to join your dinner-table if you will receive me there."

In his abstraction Monsieur Serret was beginning to say, "By all means," but Célestine had been within hearing. She came up and whispered to her master.

"Ah, I forgot, Monsieur. My daughter has delicate health, and she, (here the book-seller's politeness showed him that he could not tell the truth,) she—well, her nurse (with a helpless glance at Célestine) thinks it better she should not see strangers."

The officer bowed.

"I beg pardon. I was not aware you had children."

Célestine stood a little in the background, shrugging her shoulders and pressing her lips. "Ma foi! what fools men make of themselves! They know no more how to get out of a difficulty than a cow knows how to climb a tree. Why need he tell this stranger the very thing I did not want him to know?"

"Well," (Monsieur Serret blinked his short-sighted eyes,) "my daughter is hardly a child; she is—how old is Françoise, Célestine?"

But Célestine had slipped back out of sight into the shop, and at this moment her shrill voice sounded out:

"Monsieur is wanted tout de suite!"

Adolphe von Holst felt extremely interested, but there was nothing for it but to bow and pass on.

Monsieur Serret found Célestine instead of a customer when he stepped up the two wooden steps that led into his den.

"Comment?" and he looked like a dog robbed of a bone. A soldier fond of reading was to him a phenomenon, and he wished to continue his talk with the Prussian. He looked over his shoulder, but the Lieutenant had departed.

"Comment?" he repeated. "Tell me, Célestine, what does this mean?"

Monsieur strove to concentrate his attention so as to look dignified.

Célestine snapped her fingers.

"Monsieur, I laugh at Madame Viegron for her fussy, foolish ways, but even I would not be so indiscreet as to tell a roaring wolf of a Prussian that he was living under the same roof with a beautiful young girl."

Monsieur Serret plunged his right hand into his hair and looked bewildered.

"I don't see the harm." Then, with sudden relief, "Why, Célestine, you yourself said this officer was different from what you expected."

"But that makes no difference to Ma'm'selle." Célestine spoke hotly, and set her feet wider apart than ever. "As long as he knew nothing there was no risk; now he'll not rest till he's seen her, I know; and then"——

"Ah bah! You are foolish."

Her master turned to the shelves behind him, and lifted down a heavy volume. He opened it and planted both elbows on the pages. Célestine was obliged to retreat.

Meantime Lieut. von Holst sauntered along toward the tree-shaded boulevard of the old French town. He was smiling softly to himself as he went.

"What a joke! And that old woman did not want me to know of her young lady's existence! Well," (he stroked his moustache thoughtfully,) "Adolphe, my friend, thou hast no need to think about young girls; and yet life is so very dull since we left fighting. For fellows who smoke and drink life has always something, but for me it is different, and one grows tired of books."

He looked round him; there were seats placed at intervals under the trees, and on one of these a young girl was sitting.

He looked at her as he passed by, and he saw a bright face full of sparkling expression.

"If one could only find an excuse for speaking!" At that moment the young girl looked up; her eyes rested on his face and then they took in his dress. She looked away with an expression of pain and aversion.

The Lieutenant quickened his pace till he was out of sight of the bench beneath the trees.

"It is always so," he said. "How truehearted these French girls are! We are not men to them; they see only the Prussian uniform. It makes one long to vindicate one's self. I should like to see those dark eyes with a less bitter look in them."

Adolphe von Holst went home. He left the door of his room ajar. He even went up and down stairs several times on a vague pretext of seeking Célestine, but he did not get a glimpse of Françoise.

His window looked on to the street, but it was exactly over the entrance door. It was impossible to see any one leave or enter the house; but Adolphe had noticed that at the further end of the entrance passage there was a glass door leading to the garden or yard at the back of the house.

"Why don't I go and look out of that door?" he said.

He went down-stairs again and found his way to the glass door. He did not open it, but he looked out. It was not a garden—only a square stone yard paved with round knobs of stones, with brick walls round it. In the midst stood a lime-tree, not cut into a formal shape, but spreading its branches, and making a pleasant shade below them.

On the right of the glass door was an open staircase painted green, and from the top of this a gallery ran along the back of the house. [illegible] outside half of the court, [illegible] the gallery.

"I see the Lieutenant von Holst thoughtfully. Which of these three other rooms shut on to the gallery? Perhaps one of those which have balconies inside, and she probably uses this green staircase instead of that one indoors. Good! I think a turn in the yard will be very cool and pleasant."

But when he tried to turn the handle of the glass door he found it was locked.

Adolphe muttered some ugly German words but he stood looking out into the yard.

There was suddenly a piteous mewing, almost human; it was in pain or terror, and then something small and white fell on the round hard stones of the yard. A simultaneous cry, a rush of hurried feet, and then a light figure sprang down half the green staircase as it bound.

The Lieutenant von Holst shook the glass door furiously.

There, close to him and yet inaccessible, kneeling beside the poor little bruised kitten, was the bright face that had so charmed him on the boulevard.

"Assurément! en sécurité, Célestine!" cried the young girl.

The Lieutenant had made a prudent retreat before Célestine appeared.

She was in the kitchen, and sala lay beyond the door. Françoise called several times before the sound reached her, nurse. She rushed frantically to the glass door, and opened it with a key which hung by her side, but she did not stay to close it.

"She was too anxious about her darling to think just then of Prussian wolves. When the Lieutenant came softly down-stairs again, a few moments after, the glass door stood wide open.

"Poor little puss!"

Célestine jumped up. She gave a gasp of surprise when she saw the lodger close beside her. But Adolphe von Holst was not looking at her; his eyes were fixed on Françoise, as she sat hugging the kitten in her arms.

"Is it much hurt?" he said, gently. "Perhaps Mademoiselle will let me see it. I can do any good?"

Françoise had forgotten all her prejudices. She looked up trustingly in the stranger's face, while he took the kitten in his arms. He felt it carefully.

"There are not any broken bones. If Mademoiselle will trust me with the cure, I do not think it will be long."

Françoise looked very sweet while she thanked him; but Célestine was holding the glass door open, with a very decided frown on her black brows. The Lieutenant bowed, and went away with the kitten under his arm.

"How pretty she is!" And then a look of dissatisfaction came into his face.

"What have I to do with pretty girls? We may be called off to active service to-morrow."

II.

It is a warm afternoon. The sun has so much heat that if the leaves did not fall with that crisp sound on the round stones of the yard, you might think it was Summer still. There is a bench under the lime-tree, and on this are seated the Lieutenant von Holst and Françoise Serret.

A week has gone by since the accident, and the kitten is playing with a ball of wool, as if nothing had ever ailed it. The ball belongs to the knitting which lies in the girl's lap, and the next jerk will bring it to the ground; but Françoise takes no heed. What is she doing? She is not listening to Adolphe, for he has scarcely spoken since they sat down side by side. But there is a happy smile on her face; and if you could see under the long curving lashes that almost touch her glowing cheeks, you would find the soft dark eyes swimming in blissful tears. Françoise dares not raise them. She knows that Adolphe's eyes are fixed on her, and she has seen the love that speaks in them. She dares not let him know how fondly her heart answers that unspoken appeal.

This week has been like a delightful dream to Françoise. At first she saw the young officer for a few minutes. He only wished—so he told Célestine—to give her young mistress a daily report of the kitten's progress. But the little interviews lengthened. The officer had a volume of Goethe's lyrics, and he offered to help Mlle. Serret when she said she was only an imperfect German scholar.

"Very kind, very kind indeed," Monsieur Serret said, when Célestine told him of the Lieutenant's proposal.

Célestine shrugged her shoulders and made some wrathful objections; but with father and daughter both against her she was subdued.

It had been skillfully planned on Adolphe's part. At first interest about her kitten had blinded Françoise, and before she had time to remember that its benefactor was a Prussian came her gratitude for its cure, and then the new life which this reading had opened. Françoise had never yet loved, but the warm, impulsive heart was full of love, and every day she was learning, partly from those wondrous eyes, partly in her teacher's eyes, to know for what her heart was seeking.

These two had reached a new stage in their friendship—the kitten, the book, had alike lost interest. They had been sitting there under the lime-tree, and no word or look from the young girl had betrayed her happiness. A close observer might have noted how easily she reclined against the bench—how completely absorbed she seemed, and yet how full of soft languor. The Lieutenant's face was not so difficult to read; his eyes were full of passionate love—love so strongly shown that it was wonderful he restrained its fuller expression.

"Ma'm'selle."

Françoise started and sat upright with an uncomfortable sense of shame. She had told Célestine to leave her in peace while she took her German lesson, and till today the old woman had been fairly obedient. She knew well that no one could thwart Françoise. Somehow or other she would take her own way. So long as Célestine could keep her invisible she had watched and planned. Now it seemed to her that interference might possibly convert a harmless intimacy into a love affair.

"It is Madame Viegron, Ma'm'selle, and she is in the little salon behind the shop."

Françoise blushed deeply.

"I must go to Monsieur."

She spoke hurriedly, and her eyes at last met Adolphe's.

Somehow he took her hand in his. Françoise forgot Madame Viegron—everything. The clasp in which he held her hand was not so intense as that in which her soul seemed folded in his. She could not withdraw her eyes; they were fixed in a trance of loving union.

"Come, Ma'm'selle," Célestine went forward and touched her young lady's arm; "or shall I tell la tante you are here?"

Françoise found her aunt alone. Adèle and Victoire had been sent into the shop to talk to their uncle.

Madame Viegron's face was like a wooden doll, but the color on her hard cheeks had the crimson hue of a June apple. Her little black eyes glittered like beads when she saw Françoise.

"Bon jour, ma nièce." She held herself so stiffly that Françoise had to stand on tiptoe to kiss her. "I have heard fine talk about thee. Is it true that instead of shunning these Prussians, as it is the duty of every Frenchwoman to shun them, this officer is allowed to see thee whenever he pleases? Is it then true that thou canst find pleasure in the society of an assassin?"

Françoise had grown crimson, but she laughed at this word.

"Assassin! On soldier is not more of an assassin than another. You know, my aunt, I have never taken your advice, and I shall not begin now. If you only come to speak ill of our visitor, I shall say au revoir." She got up and made a little mocking courtesy.

Madame Viegron also got up. She shook her head slowly.

"Thou art sadly willful; but remember, whatever mischief comes from these proceedings thou hast been warned, Françoise, solemnly warned, by thy nearest female relative."

Madame Viegron walked slowly into the shop.

"Come with me, my children," she said to her two stiff-looking daughters seated there; "there is not time for you to visit your cousin today."

"But, mille pardons, there is."

Madame Viegron looked aghast. There was the culprit, whom she had, as she thought, covered with shame and confusion, kissing Adèle on both cheeks, while she pinched the ear of Victoire.

"Come, my children," in a very severe tone. "I have no time for folly."

"I don't think you have time for anything else," Françoise said to herself, as her cousins followed their mother into the street.

But Françoise was too full of happy agitation to be really angry with her aunt; she only wanted to be alone to realize some of the delight which was dancing in her veins. [illegible] to be sure that she was [illegible] Adolphe von Holst [illegible] Adolphe? [illegible]

Adolphe! The blood came rushing to her heart; she could not see him again to-morrow, and how should she get through the time? To-morrow! would it be? Should they go back to the old way of reading as they had read yesterday?—ah! how far off was yesterday now!—or would it be that dreamy sweetness of indolent happiness which had left behind it no pain or regret? Or would Adolphe—it was such a dear delight to say his name—would he speak of love in the fervent verses spoken—as his eyes had spoken it? So she sat through the afternoon in a sweet dumb dream of coming happiness. Célestine came and went, and spoken and looked, but it was all one to Françoise; her whole soul was wrapped in the book that had awakened her to the knowledge of her love.

There came a sudden murmur—a murmur which swelled along from the further end of the garden. Françoise scarcely noticed it, but Célestine opened the window and looked out.

"Ma foi, Ma'm'selle, it is the Prussians. Some new ones coming in—no, it is these who depart. Ma'm'selle, we shall then lose our Lieutenant."

Françoise turned white and faint.

"Go and see," she said. "Come back and tell me as quickly as you can."

But Célestine did not come back. The time passed slowly. To Françoise it was as if it did not pass at all. Sounds of the departing and fears each moment brought stood crowding upon her heart.

She got up and threw open the window, but it only looked into the side street which Monsieur Serret's house made the corner of.

Only a murmur of movement reached her. After a while this grew more distinct. A tramp of many feet came, more and more distinct, heavier and heavier, till it seemed as if the street pavement must sink under its weight. Tramp—tramp. They are gone at last; they have reached the end of the street, and the heavy sound grows faint, fainter still.

Françoise clings to the window; her eyes stare wildly; it seems to her that the floor on which she stands gives way. She has not even heard the door open, but instinct makes her turn round before Adolphe reaches her.

"My Françoise!"

She was in his arms, and her head on his shoulder. He pressed her tenderly to his heart. It was to Françoise as if she were at rest. All the dread fears and doubts were over. Adolphe loved her. He was forever her own.

But this bliss could not last.

"My beloved!" he whispered. "I had not thus dared, but that I must leave thee. Adieu, my Françoise—my heart's treasure!"

Again he kissed her passionately, and she felt tears on her cheeks though her own eyes were dry.

III.

A month passed by. The agony of sorrow that came to Françoise when she realized her lover's departure softened as she went over and over again every word, every look of that last meeting. Only one thought sometimes troubled this fond memory—why had Adolphe said he "would not thus have dared?"

A smile came on the sweet, blushing face. "It seems to me that love must come to that in the end. I could never confess to Adolphe that I loved him unless I could hide my eyes and feel safe that he was my own."

She never fretted. Very soon her hope outgrew her sorrow. The war must end soon, and then Adolphe would be free. She would not let herself think of her cousin Gustave's fate. She told herself two such affections could not be sent to one person. It was impossible that she could lose her darling cousin, the sharer of all her joys and sorrows, and then that her love should also be taken away. Françoise shut her eyes to the sorrow and bereavement around her. She forgot that the widow Lebrun had seen six sons fall in battle since the fight at Woerth, and that her seventh, a lad younger than Gustave, even, was now lying wounded in an ambulance.

There came a rumor that more Prussians were expected—a larger number this time—and the inhabitants would be more severely taxed.

Monsieur Serret received notice that as his house was large and his family small, he must make room for at least three inmates.

The Lieut. von Holst had conciliated both the master and the housekeeper, and Françoise had kept her secret so well that it seemed as if she only regretted the loss of her German lessons.

It was therefore a great shock to Célestine when Ma'm'selle expressed dislike to the arrival of new invaders.

"Dame! and I told M'sieur you would be glad because of the reading."

"Is it likely I could be glad to see Prussians in A——!—I, a French girl, who have suffered so deeply in this war?"

"Tiens!" Célestine stood, mop in hand. She was standing in the yard cleaning the back windows, by first throwing a capful of water against a pane and then mopping it. "There are two things in which Ma'm'selle is quite altered: she is no longer so sad for the death of Monsieur Gustave, and she can bear to speak of it. I wonder what she will say when she finds that Monsieur has arranged for the Prussians to dine every day in the salle? Well, I shall say nothing, or I may get a scolding."

Next day, when Françoise went into the salle at five o'clock, she found three Prussian officers talking with her father. She saw that they were Uhlans, and this gave her a yet stronger dislike; it seemed to her that they were in place of Adolphe, that but for them he might be here.

They all turned as she entered, and gave her the stiff military salute. Her father introduced them by name:

"The Hauptmann Schieren, and the Lieutenants Welzenborg and Durnstein."

Françoise made three profound courtesies, but she scarcely smiled. It seemed to her that the hauptmann was a little, dark, ugly, sallow-faced man, and that the Lieutenants were repetitions of each other; both had light hair, as harsh and colorless as stubble, and both had light, meaningless gray eyes.

They could neither of them speak French, and Françoise would not let them see that she could help Monsieur with his German. The hauptmann and Monsieur Serret went through a stumbling conversation, but all the party seemed glad when dinner ended—only when left alone with their coffee and pipes the Lieutenants agreed in praise of the fraulein's beauty.

Ever since Adolphe went away Françoise had gone to sit on the bench under the lime-tree. Sometimes she sat with closed eyes, acting over again, in spirit, those happy interviews; sometimes she would read over and over those verses which had most charmed her—for early in their acquaintance Adolphe had given her the little book—and often she read nothing at all but the name on the first page, "Adolphe von Holst: the gift of his mother."

"He must have loved me even then," the girl said to herself, proudly, "or he could not have given a gift from his mother."

It seemed to her that she had never asked him about his family or his home—all their talk had been of love and Goethe.

On the morning after the arrival of the officers Françoise stayed in her room. "Célestine"—she spoke to the old woman while she made the bed, with its pretty white hangings and ruffed fringes—"you can tell me as soon as the Prussians go out. I do not want to run the risk of seeing them."

"Dieu, Ma'm'selle!" Célestine smiled, but she kept her broad red lips firmly closed. "What ails the child?" she said to herself. "She used always to know her own mind. But, dame! who knows? It is possible she will be dear friends with these officers to-morrow; she was much fiercer against our Lieutenant at the beginning."

For the first time in her life Célestine felt dissatisfied with her young lady. She obeyed her orders, however, and as soon as the officers left the house Françoise came down the green staircase and sat under the lime-tree.

"If either of them come in you can easily warn me in time, Célestine."

But while she housekeeper was intent on the concoction of a very dish the hauptmann came back. Françoise had made a hasty retreat before Célestine reached the yard. The hauptmann was coming from the lime-tree reading a book. Célestine's quick eyes recognized the book in an instant.

"The marauding vagabond!" she muttered. "It is then true that they pick and steal all they can lay their hands on. Parbleu, Monsieur!" (she placed herself just in front of the hauptmann, with her feet wide apart and her hands on her hips,) "but that is the book of my young lady. She held out her brown hand.

The hauptmann put his head a little on one side and held the book fast. He looked slyly through his small dark eyes at the angry face before him.

"Pardon," he said, "but it is not the name of Mademoiselle that is in this book."

"Bien, Ma'm'selle." Célestine smiled, but she kept her broad red lips firmly closed. "What ails the child?" she said to herself. "She used always to know her own mind. But, dame! who knows? It is possible she will be dear friends with these officers to-morrow; she was much fiercer against our Lieutenant at the beginning."

[illegible] of the country. It is said to be very stimulating in its properties, and is recommended by resident physicians to consumptive people with weak stomachs, mothers nursing their infants, and others requiring a mild stimulant. The consumption of this liquor are brought into the City of Mexico daily on mule's backs, and a special railroad train, known as the "Pulque Train," runs down to Apam daily, coming back loaded with it. Pulque is in Mexico like the place of wine and beer shops in Europe and the United States, and the liquor being sold at about three cents per quart, is consumed in almost unlimited quantities by the common classes. It produces a mild, good-natured drunk, more like the effect of opium than like that of whisky, and in this respect is the direct opposite of mezcal.—Cortland Monthly.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH PICTURES.—Sensualism or nastiness is certainly not the vice of English exhibitions. The vice of English exhibitions is dullness. French art, as the reflection of French life and mind, suffers, as those who love France most dearly must fain acknowledge, from a general taint. English art suffers from an atrophic and intellectual taint. The Frenchman, with his brilliant susceptibility to impressions, and his complete moral indifference, will be interested in his art by scenes by the wholesale, which, on the other hand, as he is pointed, skillful, and expressive must, fascinate. He will enjoy what is vicious and repulsive on just the same terms, and in just the same part of himself, as he will enjoy what is graceful and dignified if the idea is exhibited to his imagination in the same telling and efficient way as the other; he will make no difference in his mind between Hogs and Angelico. Or rather—well, is it too much to say to him, in his modern mind, that he will rather lean to indulgence toward those exhibitions that tickle his vices, and forgive faults in the representation of a Phyrne that he would be the first to denounce in that of a Cecilia? Certainly there are pictures, (as a certain camp-breaking of a mediæval army this year,) of which he seems to condemn the sullenness for the sake of the immorality. We on the other hand, will have none of the immorality, but are as much beneath the visitation of dullness. By dullness, I mean that kind of clogged perception, that inability to see or render more than the obvious show of things, that lethargy of the finer susceptibilities whether of sense or spirit, which yet does not prevent a man or woman in England from following the arts with applause. It is really that which sinks so much of an art below the level of consideration. One might draw a low-water line of moral elevation, and find that much of the most brilliant French work fell below it—that Cynicism entered very soon into the Frenchman's artistic pleasure. One might on the other hand, draw a low-water line of artistic quality, and find that three out of four of the most respected contributions to the English Academy did not come up to it. We sit down and paint scenes of the family; we costume and group our models for a representation of history or romance, or common life, with excellent intentions; and the result is—nothing—an inherent minus quantity. We are not sharp enough to sense any real point either with our imaginations or our senses; because what we produce is an honest piece of ineffective schoolboy work, which perhaps nearly makes a stupid joke, or approximately tells a familiar anecdote, or roughly revives a commonplace association; and we do not suspect that art has to make its appeal to poignant feelings, or at least to discriminating eyes and alert intelligences—to which these unrefined commonplaces mean absolutely nothing.—The Cornhill Magazine.

THE LATE MR. MAURICE.—The late Mr. MAURICE was both a philosopher and a theologian, and in an unusual degree he gave a philosophical coloring to his theology, and a theological tone to his philosophy. He was in his youth a member of that remarkable society of young men at Cambridge, known as the Apostles, who have encouraged high-thinking in England perhaps in a higher degree than any similar association that can be named. He had been litterateur, novelist, scholar, but most of all he was a philosopher. Mr. MAURICE had also family affinities with some of the most remarkable writers of the day. He had not that patriotic learning or familiarity with German exegesis that enabled such men as TRENCH and ALFORD so prominently to set their mark on the clerical mind; but Mr. MAURICE seems to have been superior to both those eminent men in philosophical culture and in breadth of intellect. His distinctive principles were only few, but he surveyed the whole world of thought in their illustration, and he was sometimes almost lost in the illimitable fields over which he wandered. His mind was essentially of the Socratic cast. Plato-like, he would delight in dialogues of Search and Negation; and the intellectual process of inquiry was as welcome as any of its results. He was one of those who were brought within the living influence of COLERIDGE, and in a transmuted form transmitted that great philosopher's esoteric teaching to a new public. Mr. MAURICE had an extraordinary power of concentrating abstract thought on contemporary history. We have heard him spoken of, in the '48 times, as the Christian Socialist; and certainly he would not then have disclaimed the title of Communist if permitted to give his own definition of the term. His best sympathies, his best energies were with working men, nor would he greatly care for specious notions which were unassimilable into action. His nature vibrated to every wave of current history, and he was consumed by the love of truth and freedom. Mr. MAURICE gathered round him a band of earnest and attached disciples. His friends often loved him with a passionate enthusiasm, and looked upon "the Prophet" as an ancient school of prophets would look on the mighty prophet of their time. The preachership of Lincoln's Inn, one of the great prizes of the Church, was at one time occupied by a rhetorical eccentricity, while the humbler post of chaplain belonged to the ardent philosopher, who often drew together the best minds of London. How many of us there are who recollect those afternoons of long ago, in that exquisite chapel of almost cathedral-like beauty, where the stained light fell mellowly through the illuminated windows, perhaps lighting up for a while a glorious noble face—and brow of the preacher. We used to hang on his rich, tremulous, eloquent accents, which have left on so many an indescribable impression. Mr. MAURICE was in those days the centre and focus of wide spiritual and intellectual interests. His conflict with Principal FELT, on the import of the word eternal, lost him his chair at King's College, but perhaps deepened and extended his popularity. Nevertheless, when the First Commissioner of Works transferred him to Vere Chapel, he did not seem to retain the same hold on a more mixed assemblage as he did on the more select audience of Lincoln's Inn.

Mr. MAURICE was a writer of the clarissimo order. In fact, he had two styles, one eminently transparent, the other involved and obscure. When he had to present philosophy in historical forms, he was remarkable for clearness and precision. His four volumes on the History of Philosophy are perhaps his most useful and permanent writings. On philosophico-religious subjects, invested with some degree of mysticism, some degree of metaphysics, it was often extremely hard to detect his real point of view. We have gone through some of his writings, pencil in hand, and could only very rarely, as lightning upon a definite opinion, underline a passage or two down a page. The thoughts were often so vague and subtile as to elude fixity; and there are various interesting subjects on which we should be glad to be assured what Mr. MAURICE's real opinions were. The intellect was splendid and lucid, but perhaps not without alloy of what was crochety. Mr. MAURICE's wonderful influence was, to a great extent, a personal influence; none of his writings have the simplicity, charm and tenderness of his conversation.—London Society.

REST.—The best medicines in the world, more efficient in the cure of disease than all the potencies of the chemist's shop, are warmth, rest, cleanliness, and pure air. Some persons make it a virtue to brave disease, "to keep up" as long as they can move a foot or bend a finger, and it sometimes succeeds; but in others, the powers of life are thereby so completely exhausted that the system has lost all ability to recuperate, and slow and typhoid fever sets in, and carries the patient to a premature grave. Whenever walking or work is an effort, a warm bed and a cool room are the very first indispensable steps to a sure and speedy recovery. Instead of all hearts and hands to gainsay and resist the very moment disease or wounds assail the system.—Dow Bills.

LATRO PATORES AND WAMPIRES.

"I have sat chatting or listening into the morning or dozing at our camp fire smoking with Spain," said the gentleman to me. "You have simply to apply the history of your country, and that of every South American State, to the subject. Hard as it is possible, when she talks of our young men have been educated either in the United States or in England, France or Germany, that they should have any notions other than those instilled from their nurses with more liberal or progressive ideas? I shall confine myself as strictly as possible to the nature of the strife in which I have been one of the soldiers. I am now here on sick leave. Badly wounded some months ago, I should not have left the island if it had not been for some peculiar service I was called upon to carry out here. I am, therefore, now on duty here, serving the cause of free Cuba. There was not much trouble in leaving the island; scars are, in fact, thousands of means of escape, though to come back again, I must confess, is more difficult. It may be interesting for you to know that, according to the best authorities, I have been left for compassionately wounded twice, have been arrested I think four times, have been drowned once, and in order that I may, I suppose, be thoroughly entertained, I had the honor to be among those condemned within the last two weeks to be garrotted, which I suppose I should be did they ever catch me. To be shot in action"—and here he lit a cigarette—"is what may happen to any one. Even to have a musket put to your head after capture, and to have your brains blown out is not pleasant, but"—and here he blew a volume of smoke out of his nostrils—"to be seated in a chair, bound fast with iron, and to have your neck twisted round by a machine, is a very disagreeable death. Yet I suppose it would not be disgraceful, as my father, two brothers, and an uncle, have gone to their end in that way."

I do not look like a Cuban, as you remark, and I am pleased that you compliment me on my English. I suppose my features resemble those of my grandfather, who was an Englishman, who came to the island at the close of the last century. In fact, we have a great deal of mixed blood in Cuba—English, Irish, American, French and German, and just as like as not the inherent desire for liberty and better government, with the steadfast, dogged character of the strife, may arise in part from this intermingling of blood. We do not feel, think, nor have any ideas in common with the Spaniards. But excuse me. I find it difficult not to wander from the point.

Before, long before I graduated as a lawyer, I had liberal ideas, and I suppose in all my class, it had been determined that as soon as our degrees had been conferred on us, that we would take to the woods. A portion of the class left the island for Nassau to join an expedition there, and we procured arms. This did not suit me, for I wanted immediate service. I took the railroad, and set off at a place called Colon, a good many miles distant from Havana. There I was supplied by a friend (there are innumerable friends everywhere on the island) with a good horse, having directions where to find a mozo, a day's journey off, who was to guide me to my friends. I found them after some little difficulty, and the body of Cubans I met were commanded by such officers as Villegas, Cavada and A. Arnas. There is very little of the pride or pomp of war to be found on our side. A more sorry set of men as to dresses I never saw. To describe their uniforms would be superfluous; the fact is, a majority had hardly any clothes at all, and as to arms, anything that will shoot answered their purpose. Fowling-pieces, muskets, blunderbusses, and every kind and make of rifle; one arm, however, the machete, is in universal use. It not only serves as an arm of defense, but is a necessity in order to cut through the brush and vegetation through which we have to force our way. It is a terrible weapon, however, and without anything else but machetes, I have seen an advance of Spanish regulars brought to a standstill, and often driven off the ground. Some of the jungles which grow in the interior render it almost impossible for a man to bring his gun to his shoulder, and creeping vines will tangle up any soldiers with guns and bayonets; it is just here that the machete comes into play. It is a beautiful arm at close quarters. Of course we use our fire-arms when we can, and it is a pity we have not more of them, but as ammunition is scarce, we have to husband it. Our cannon are peculiar. We take raw hide, plait it in fine strands, and bind it tightly round a wooden core. When the hide strips are dry, we remove the wooden centre. It is not very lasting. At the end of ten discharges it is used up. It will not carry a solid ball, but will throw grape and canister with some precision. We have, though, some very good guns, well equipped, which we are keeping back for future occasions. Very wisely, our policy is to fight only small engagements—skirmishes, if you please—where there is no occasion of using even light artillery. Where we are fighting, the ground is generally so densely covered with vegetable growth, that it is hard for a man to crawl through. For the last six months, I have been fighting in the swamps, and our sufferings have been terrible. Cholera, small-pox and a fearful cutaneous disease decimated us. In this swamp campaign we must have lost 1,500 men by sickness alone. I do not think it an exaggeration to say 4,000 Spanish soldiers were buried around the Zapata Swamp. We were surrounded, and excess was impossible. Portillo's idea was a good one, which was by making a living wall of Spanish soldiers around this horrible swamp, to keep us there until we rotted to death or gave in. As it is, we held them, 20,000 of them, at bay for over three months. Skirmishes were of constant occurrence. We did nothing in the day time but beat off their attacks, refreshing ourselves at night with nocturnal surprises on detached portions of the enemy. It was a deadly struggle. It is a bitter thing to say, and terrible when one thinks that even warfare has had something of its fearful brutality taken from it; but here there was no quarter, on both sides it is now a war of extermination. I do not think there is any very deep animosity toward the Spanish soldier or his officer; they have their duty to perform, and occasionally, very rarely, some of the old chivalry of Spain is apparent among them; but with the volunteers, when we have to fight them, the hatred is intense—they are worse than brutes.

The shooting of these school-boys never will be forgiven, nor ought it to be. The greatest trouble in the march fighting was to obtain ammunition and food. The former came to us in small driblets from the people in the neighborhood. They bought it of the Spanish soldiers, and as several Spanish Quarter-masters disappeared about that time for old Spain, I fancy Spanish payment and hell paid for with Cuban money, was what we used. As to food, we were often two days without a mouthful, subsisting on palmitto and guajani, native wild fruits, which hardly kept us alive. Outside of the swamp, when we first were driven to it, was a land of plenty. Wild cattle and hogs were abundant, but after a short time the Spaniards ate them all up, and then, with their want of providence, having murdered all the inhabitants, and burnt the fields, they themselves were pretty nearly, if not quite, as much in want of food as we were.

We were as exceedingly hard put to crack; so it seemed. We managed to have almost always friends in the Spanish lines, so that no advance could they make, but that we were informed of it, and two or three ambuscades took place every week. Generally, except when cornered as we were in the swamp, our men do not suffer for want of food. Nature is bountiful under the tropics. It is usual, when a camp or rendezvous is formed, to clear a few acres in the midst of a wood, and to plant sweet potatoes, corn and pumpkins. In two months there will be a fair crop. But a vegetarian diet of pumpkins for a warrior with a good deal of fighting, is not very strengthening food. I must confess I like the food at Delmonico's much better. However, complaints are rare.

Our soldiers are of all grades and colors. Quarter and regular. Some escape from Spanish Quarters and regular. Some escape from Spanish Quarters, and others, with their families, to wind, gave in, thousands took the oath. There are remaining when in action, and cannot keep their courage still, seeming the enemy like weaker wretch. I don't think they like the bayonet, as I have often heard them cry to the Spanish troops "to come out and shoot and fight fair." The negroes are plucky to a degree. They are wonderfully proficient with the arm, the machette. I have had the honor to be in some pretty good fights with mixed soldiers armed in this way, and have whipped the enemy every time. You ask me to give you some detailed account of any peculiar atrocities I have seen. Well, here is one. A lady, Pudila Martinez by name, living near Supiano, had two of her brothers in the insurrection. A band of Spaniards and volunteers, I am inclined to think the volunteers were in force, passed her house in pursuit of us. At the gate of their house they met an old negro. The negro mistook them for us, and on their asking him to cry "Viva Caspedes!" which he did with a will, they blew his brains out. Then, going to the door, they inquired of the lady whether we had passed. As soon as she had witnessed the death of her old servant, knowing her father was in the house, she rushed to his protection and seized a machete. On her refusing to give any information, the volunteers deliberately shot and bayonetted her. The same day we returned, and I myself was one of those who carried off her bleeding form. There was something very sad about this. She was a highly-cultivated woman, and had composed some very touching verses in praise of the Virgin-Mother of God. She was not quite dead when we picked her up, but expired a few hours afterward, chanting over so sweetly she hymn she had written. This is horrible. What, you want another? The handsomest young lady living at Yaguaramas was Juanita Cobo, and she sang, too, like a nightingale. These volunteers would have her sing—insisted that she would favor them; but she must sing some hateful song—a ribald one, perhaps, or one which bore a taunt in it to our cause—the one she loved. She would not sing. I know you have a childish saying, that "little birds who will not sing must be made to sing." Their persuasion came in the gentle way of a volley of muskets. They did not exactly kill poor Juanita, but left her maimed and crippled, poor bird, for life. But push! I cannot tell you more. I have seen a mother starving in the woods, frenzied with hunger like a mad beast, sore so mad as to even to forget her natural instinct of a mother. I tell you I spent whole days hunting for her in a trackless wild, and found her at last a gaunt skeleton. But enough of this.

The world generally supposes that those who are of Spanish blood are given to sudden bursts of passion or enthusiasm, but in our case you are mistaken. You hear no complaints, no boastings; there is nothing but a bull-dog pertinacity about it. We have suffered terribly, and perhaps our cup of misery is not yet fully drained; we must fight it out, but that we must conquer in the end is certain.

You had your Fourth of July last week. One year ago on the highest peaks of the Sierranas Mountains, an American in our service and your humble servant raised two call fag staffs. On one was the Stars and Stripes; on the other the Cuban flag. I don't think we were more than ten men, all told; but for the sake of a good joke on our friends the Spaniards, we made what you call Quaker guns, and built up a slight embrasure. Such a commotion as it made. Three days afterwards we were attacked in force. The Troche is a farce—of no account. It means a military line. It don't prevent our hearing from Havana every day, and I almost always get a New-York newspaper in from ten to twelve days after its issue. You see we have friends—friends everywhere. Like the contest? No. I heartily wish it was over. It is the most inhuman contest ever known, and is likely very possibly to be worse. Even when not fighting, the torments from the insects are terrible. I do not know which I dislike the most to meet in Cuba—a flea or a Spaniard—they are both insufferable, only the fleas are much more numerous. I sometimes think their constant annoyance adds to the acrimony of the contest; they do say, however, that they are of Gallician origin. Of course we bandy a great many terms of disrespect between us. We call the Spaniards "Latro Patores." That means a big-footed robber. They in return dub us "Mambises." There is a little bird on the Island of Jamaica, famous for the noise and chattering it makes; but though the woods swarm with them, one never was seen on the plains, and is called Mambises. We accept with pleasure the name of Mambises; perhaps some day when we grow bolder, we may take to the plains and become eagles. Quien sabe?

The Indian Visitors at the Astor House—Their Interpreters and Guides.

The Indian delegates from the Apaches and other Arizonian tribes, to the Great Father at Washington, were objects of interest to callers at the Astor House yesterday. They of course, have been exceedingly astonished at the many wonderful things they have seen on their long journey; but having donned the garb of Eastern civilization, their interpreters say they feel uncomfortable in it, and would gladly doff the cumbrous habiliments for the more free and easy styles of the wild West. Then they see a great many things here they would much like to possess; but it takes money in this part of the world to acquire them, and of this commodity the Chiefs are unlucky rather short.

Mr. H. Bendell, Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Arizona, who accompanies the gentle savages, says that all the tribes of Apaches are at peace with the white men, only there are a few incorrigible Tonto Apaches who raid in small bands "on their own hook," and much against the wishes of their Chiefs. These give a bad name to the tribe.

Es-kai-te-ca-la, hereditary Chief, and Pedro, Subchief, represent about 1,500 Sierra Blanco Apaches, and Santos, a Subchief, about the same number of Pinal Apaches. These four, under charge of Gen. Howard, visited the Academy of Design, Central Park and other places of interest in the City yesterday. The remaining five delegates remained in the hotel. Louis Mangas and Antonito Chati, a young chief, represent the Pimo Indians. Both of them are quite intelligent, especially Louis, who speaks four languages, English, Spanish, Pimo, Papago and Maricopo. Hosea Ba-ko-ta and Carlos Ah-a-ton-a represent the Apache Mo-ha-ve Indians, about 1,500 in number. Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who was captured by the Indians when seven years of age and who has been with them thirty-three years, is the only interpreter who speaks Apache. Messrs. May and A. Buttner are the other interpreters. The latter is an African guide and scout, who is known among the Indians as "White Head." He has had some remarkable adventures among them, and is a man of acknowledged bravery. He is a young German of twenty-five years of age, and has been in the Territory eight years.

Today the Indian visitors will accompany Gen. Howard to the Reformed Church, corner of Fifth-avenue and Twenty-first-street. To-morrow the Chiefs of the Sierra Blanco and Pinal Apaches will go to Ombersen and Harrabun, as guests for New-Mexico, under charge of the General, and the other delegates will go with Superintendent Bendell to Albany, and via Niagara to Chicago, thence to San Francisco, and so home.

A Mastodon Found in California.

From the Sacramento Union, July 4.

Gentlemen from Rio Vista inform us that there was recently found near that place the skeleton of a mastodon, almost entire and petrified. Some of the bones crumbled to pieces on contact with the air, but, of course, speaking correctly, there are sufficient portions of the skeleton left to make a better specimen of the extinct species to which the animal belonged than any of the museums of the country contain.

THE JURY OUT.

Yesterday's Proceedings in the Fisk Murder Case.

The District-Attorney's Address—The Judge's Charge—Scenes in Court—Stokes Indifferent—The Jury Locked Up for the Night.

Yesterday the trial of Edward S. Stokes for the murder of James Fisk, Jr., was formally submitted to the jury for final decision, after an investigation which lasted twenty days. Since the celebrated case of Daniel McFarland, no criminal trial in this City attracted as much public interest, an interest which has gradually increased toward its culmination, which was reached yesterday. Each successive day witnessed immense crowds of people, comprising many ladies, studying eagerly to obtain an entrance into Court, and watching the proceedings with the most intense anxiety. No difficulties or embarrassments seemed to check their purpose, and day after day the same faces, bearing precisely the same expression of interest, were seen scattered throughout the Court. When District-Attorney Garvin resumed his address for the prosecution, yesterday, the Court was densely crowded. Judge Ingraham formally charged the jury on the evidence and the legal points involved, and at 2½ they retired for consultation. At 4:25 they came into Court to ascertain the opinion of the Judge in regard to premeditation, and then immediately returned to the jury-room. During all this time Stokes chatted gayly in the anteroom with his father, mother, sister and friends, apparently the most disinterested of all the spectators. He did not appear to be in the least disconcerted as to the result, but there were some close observers who claimed that underneath this levity, and in the dull, heavy eye slept a deep, earnest, terrible realization of the frightful position in which he was placed. Yet, in Court, Stokes was calm and collected, and his manner showed the entire absence of anything undignified or indecorous. At 7:10 o'clock the jurors were called into Court, and, not having agreed to their verdict, were locked up until 10½ o'clock this morning. Stokes was then remanded to the Tombs.

YESTERDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

When Judge Ingraham took his seat on the Bench, Mr. Tremaine rose and said that Dr. Sayre had visited him and explained that he (Dr. Sayre) had not attended the caucus of doctors, and had not expressed an opinion in the case. Mr. Tremaine said, at 2 o'clock ordered it to be discontinued. He believed that was the evidence, and he desired to do no wrong to Dr. Sayre.

Mr. Garvin then resumed his speech, calling attention again to the responsibility of the jury, the impossibility of arriving with our present means at absolute truth, and the necessity, therefore, of filling up the broad outlines of evidence with all its passions, influence and weaknesses. On that the jury must decide. The wisdom of humanity had decreed that when one man willfully kills another his own blood should pay for it. If it be asked, to what end the prosecution, the answer is, by law. If there was any excuse, any justification, it was for the prisoner to show it. He had washed his hands of his blood at the Tombs. What did he mean? What was the character of the man killed? It was for the prisoner to show any justification. What was it? Insanity—nothing. Lord he said on that point "Gentlemen, if the man I killed, I meant to shoot him; I did shoot him, and he died; but had it not been for the malpractice of his doctors he would have lived." Suppose the case of a feeble man shot, lying exposed to a great storm, wounded and unable to go home; lingering on for days from fever, and covered with the morning too late to save his life. Would the murderer be permitted to say: "Had he been fed and treated skillfully at home he would not have died?"

Mr. Garvin recalled to them the use of prussic acid or a gill of brandy in excess under certain conditions. There was no talk about poisoning, but all agreed it was proper to poison, as far as the learned Dr. Hammond said, the approved remedy for opium! Dr. Buck, a sort of apostle in medicine, said it was the approved remedy. He read from authorities on the same effect, and claimed that the treatment was perfectly proper and justified. If there were a juror on the face of the earth who gave any weight to this, he bade him a long farewell. There was no such juror in this City.

As to the other defense, that Mr. Fisk had a pistol in his hand. If it was not true, then his defense was gone. The only testimony to that effect was by the prisoner, confronted by a man concerned with those who had plotted against him, and who had taught to defend other in this peril. Counsel had quoted Knox on the gambler. A greater than Knox had said: "Deliver me from the strange woman. Her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead." He called on them as religious men, as human men, to strike from their consideration the whole of her testimony, to believe none of it. The proof that men followed this man to kill Fisk sent them. Fisk had called on counsel to say who proved that Fisk sent them. The insanity dodge and the self-defense theory failed. He again proceeded on those three responsibilities and the conduct which their action would evoke. He cared nothing for the Erie Ring or the Tammany Ring or other great rings or the Greeley Ring. He did care for right, justice and truth. If they had good reason to disclose any witness let them bring it out. There was evidence enough on each side. If there was a killing without provocation it was murder. If they release this man blood would continue to flow in the streets, and called on them to do their duty manfully and fearlessly, so that on the morrow day they might know they had done their duty, let consequences take the course they would. By the law he was to be judged, by the law he was to be punished. They were simply to render their verdict according to the evidence.

The Court took a recess before charging.

THE JUDGE'S CHARGE.

After the recess Judge Ingraham charged as follows:

The duty of a Judge, gentlemen, is not always a pleasant one. He is called upon at times in civil matters to decide between men and men on questions of the most momentous nature. This, in the respects particularly that it is a unpleasant. It is none so while he is called upon in a criminal Court to pass upon questions of the utmost moment to the individual who is on trial before you. Whether the result of the trial involves life or imprisonment, in the present case, that duty is still more unpleasant, because it relates to a man now present in the Commonwealth that act was in the enjoyment of health, of young friends, and everything that makes life enjoyable. Yet this man is now placed before us as the result of a transaction which involves the life. While it is my duty to pass upon these questions I can see it is equally unpleasant to you to pass upon a question which involves as much as is involved here. I know that you are anxious here in the performance of a disagreeable task, but I know also that you have a duty to perform—a duty you owe to the public, a duty you owe to yourselves, and I doubt not that in the discharge of that duty you will speak in unison with the sentiments of the responsible tribunal upon you, and you will do justice to the people, do justice to the prisoner, and do justice to yourselves under your oath. I feel it my duty to charge you that there is no evidence of insanity in this case. I say quite over the impression that rests upon your minds that it was borne out by the testimony adduced on the trial. I feel it my duty to urge you to try this case with the impression that it is your duty to dismiss sympathy for the prisoner, his family, or his friends. If he had done that year minus any prejudice existing against the prisoner, Fenian sympathy, or any other feeling which will tend to the favor or disfavor of prisoner, other than what has been derived from the consideration of the case. Remember we have a simple question to try, and you have a simple duty to perform. It is one of fact, and that is, whether this prisoner is guilty of one of the charge preferred against him. This case is presented to you under an indictment for murder in the first degree. Murder is the killing of a human being without excuse or justification, with malice to take life. The case is presented to you under two aspects on the part of the prosecution, and on another case sent on the part of the defense, that the death of Fisk was caused by a pistol shot, that in furtherance of that design the prisoner, through Twenty-third-street, that the Opera House, through Twenty-third-street, of the movement of the deceased, directed his driver to carry him to the Grand Central Hotel; that he went in there, through the private entrance, went up to the second floor, and there placed himself in the position in which he could examine the persons who ascended that staircase, and immediately on the appearance of Fisk he made use of the words "Now I have got you," and at the moment he fired the first shot. Fisk ran down the first flight, wounded, but not fatally, and the death.

Another theory on which the prosecution is based is, that the prisoner came to the Grand Central Hotel with the intention of taking his life, that when he was at the head of the stairs he saw Fisk coming, and then determined to take his life. Fisk coming and then determining to take his life, there was such an issue as to the first theory. If there was such an issue, if you are to consider which it is not my duty to do so. You are to form an opinion as to the intention of Fisk, from his acts, conduct and declarations, by all the circumstances connected with the transaction, if you find there is an issue. It was equally stated on the part of the prosecution, from the evidence, that Fisk was shot in the back, while at the head of the stairs, he was then prepared to make a defense, if that followed. The fact of firing twice is also a circumstance which you are to consider well, and also the attendant circumstances before and after the shooting took place. Whether you find that the shot was fired in the back or before you the evidence, the prisoner, if he was at previous to the arrival at the hotel, I leave it all to you. If you do come to the conclusion that he had made up his mind to take the life of Fisk, if you find that the act was premeditated, and if you find any circumstances therein to warrant you in stating that he was justified or excused in that act, or that there is some other cause that remedies him from the charge of murder, you will find him guilty.

The second theory upon which this case is presented to you, on the part of the prosecution, is that this intent to fire was formed after he had placed himself at the head of the stairs. Now, the issue is left this, which constitutes murder, may be made at any time before the firing taken place or the place to divert. The prosecution show at this branch of the case that he had come in as the private entrance, went up to the halfway and, turned himself at the head of the stairs, and said, "I have got you," he fired two balls at Fisk. Immediately after, were he passed through the hall to the door of the parlor, met a man who saw him thrust his pistol into his pocket. He was arrested by Officer Hart, to whom he said, "There is a man shot, he with Fisk; I was Fisk's friend, and I shot the villain." He was arrested, but made no expressions. He was searched, and no pistol was found. He was carried before Fisk, he, identified him, made no further complaint. He made no claim of self-defense, and, on the march of the men I will say nothing. Now, gentlemen, I have already had been examined here, they have to testify for quite that the pistol was made up then to take the life of Fisk, unless you find it was justifiable homicide. There are the two issues, as to the part of the prosecution, and they are met by the evidence of the witnesses who have been examined here. In some of their evidence they have stated in the most explicit manner, that they supposed. There have been these facts presented, though they are scanned for the prisoner, and it has been brought to your attention by the prisoner and counsel. Any expression of my opinion in the matter would not materially aid you. You have heard the remarks of the prosecution and counsel, and you are the judges of what they are entitled to receive.

Now, gentlemen, I propose taking up the other side of the case, which is the prisoner's statement; that is the few remarks I have to make you will see the relation they bear to the other side. His statement again certainly bears himself. He alone can testify to his intent directly, and the law allows him to take the stand to his own defense. He tells you that he went to this hotel not for the purpose of meeting Fisk, but for the purpose of seeing a lady, who has waved a handkerchief to him from the upper window, and he thought he recognized her; she was crossed over for the purpose of seeing her. That statement is taken for what it is worth. He also says he went up and asked the lady to go with him. She refused to go. The prisoner left him, and went and ascended the stairs. He says he went toward the parlor to see the lady, but he turned and came down the stairs. He says they went in the direction of the dining-room, and that he intended to go out, when the prisoner informed him he went along toward the head of the stairs. He says that he had some conversation with this man as to the best place down there, by four or five steps, and then he discovered Fisk at the foot of the stairs. He says he saw Fisk draw his pistol from the back pocket of his pantaloons, and he was afraid of his life, and believing if he did not fire his life was in danger, he fired the pistol. He says he did not expect to kill the man, he admits that he did not expect to kill him, but he fired. He says that Fisk, after the second shot, dropped the pistol on the platform, and he then ran down the stairs, and he ran out of the house. He says he had been told by his counsel not to say that he had been told by his counsel that the witness testimony is his own testimony. He is conscientious in all the material parts by the testimony on the part of the prosecution, and they are met by the evidence of the witnesses who have been examined here. In some of their evidence they have stated in the most explicit manner, that they supposed. There have been these facts presented though the prisoner, and it has been brought to your attention by the prisoner and counsel. Any expression of my opinion in the matter would not materially aid you. You have heard the remarks of the prosecution and counsel, and you are the judges of what they are entitled to receive.

Now, gentlemen, I propose taking up the other side of the case, which is the prisoner's statement; that is the few remarks I have to make you will see the relation they bear to the other side. To those who have so liberally responded to our call for funds to procure a day's enjoyment in the open air for the poor children of the City, we have again the pleasure of saying, "See how much happiness a little well spent money can secure." Of the 800 children who participated in the second excursion of yesterday, it is safe to say that there were a large number to whom a sight of the fields and woods came like a genuine revelation. The influence upon hundreds of boys and girls growing up in frequent contact with moral and physical impurity, of a day of simple, whole-hearted and natural enjoyment, cannot fail to be of the most salutary kind. To help to bring home to the minds of those little ones the fact that people who have money to spend can feel for them and with them, is a task whose necessity and importance cannot well be overestimated, and one to whose accomplishment these weekly excursions will bring a very powerful aid.

The Stokes case has been given to the jury, after a very clear and special presentation by Judge INGRAHAM of the points on which a verdict should be based. It seems pretty obvious from the question put by the jury after a brief return into Court, yesterday evening, that the Judge's charge did succeed in making clear to the minds of these twelve men what was the main question before them. After the mass of irrelevant and contradictory testimony which had been lugged into the case, this involves no slight triumph of judicial acuteness and impartiality. Judge INGRAHAM very properly stated, in his charge, that "the intent to take life, which constitutes murder, may be made at any time before the firing takes place or the blow is struck." This statement was repeated with still greater emphasis in reply to the question put by the jury, and will doubtless have its due weight with the men to whom has been committed the solemn question of the degree of the guilt of EDWARD S. STOKES.

Gen. FRANK BLAIR and the New-York World give rather different readings of what the Democratic Party expect from Mr. GREELEY. The Senator assured a sympathetic audience at St. Louis on Wednesday last that the nomination of Mr. GREELEY at Baltimore was the greatest example of self-abnegation recorded of any party. "They have not sought office for themselves in making these nominations," said the eminently disinterested statesman, who has been so notoriously distinguished for his adhesion to pure, unadulterated principle in the past; that of course nobody will hesitate to credit him with a similar kind of devotion now. It is probably that the World should perish in being the "terrible infant" of the party, and in blurting out family secrets in this fashion! "The only thing that can reconcile Democrats to Mr. GREELEY's candidacy in the moral and political control the party would have over him as its regular candidate, and the obligation he would, thereby incur to treat the party with deference and consideration in conducting the Government." An arrangement to give him our votes, and, at the same time, release him from all obligation or amenability to the party, would be an act of supreme folly of which we cannot believe that the Baltimore Convention would be capable." It is probable that in spite of Senator BLAIR the people will insist in regarding Mr. GREELEY as the candidate "with the Democratic hook through his nose."

German newspapers are co-operating with German statesmen in making the next Papal election the turning point of the future relations between the Empire and the Papacy. The most superficial observer of the influences which dominate the Vatican, must be driven to the conclusion that the next Pope will certainly be an Italian, and an ally of the Jesuits. It is equally obvious that such an election would be the signal for what may be called the disestablishment of the Romish Church in Germany. Or to put it, perhaps, more exactly, the Empire would stop what it could of the revenues of all the Bishops and priests who acknowledged the Pope in whose election Germany was not consulted, and would give its Catholic subjects the option of having the rites of their Church administered by ecclesiastics who acknowledged no other authority save that of a German Primate and a German Emperor, or of paying for the maintenance of a Romish system for themselves. Here is the argument for the interference of the secular arm in the next Papal election, as stated by the semi-official North German Gazette:

"The Bishops are reduced to be mere instruments of the Pope, functionaries accountable to him. The Governments may therefore justly regard them as officers of a foreign sovereign, and of one whose power, owing to his ex cathedra infallibility, bears the character of a thorough absolutism. Before the Governments concede this position to the new Pope, before they accord him such an influence over their subjects, they must inquire whether the election and the person chosen offer those guarantees against the abuse of this plenitude of power which it is their right and their duty to demand."

One Col. CLAYBORNE assured an audience in St. Louis, the other night, that GREELEY and BROWN would be elected by "spontaneous combustion." We can recollect of but two personages who owed a very striking change in their career to this cause; the one was old Krook in Bleak House, and the other, if we mistake not, was the lady who officiated as maternal relative to Jacob Faithful. (Both these personages are said to have owed the peculiar manner of their exit to indulgence in fluids heretofore condemned by Mr. GREELEY.) DICKENS wrote a preface in defense of his theory that a man could take leave of the world in the midst of a very sickly smoke and a nauseous stench. Is the Western orator prepared to show that nominees at Baltimore will "go off" more sweetly?

Last week the number of deaths in New-York City was 1,056. This is 513 less than the terrible record of the previous week. It is still, however, 436 above the average of the first six months of the year, and represents a proportion equal to 55.6 per 1,000 per annum, which is at least twice as much as it ought to be. As in the first week of July, the greater part of the mortality of last week will doubtless be found to be made up of children under five years of age.

The German Vote.

The Tammany organs are making a great boast of their strength among the Germans. It is difficult to see on what it is based. The only portion of this class of voters at all likely to be attracted by the Democratic candidate is that which includes the most ignorant, and politically the most servile. This portion may be carried away by the sham of party discipline, but its numbers are relatively very weak.

Most Germans, in common with intelligent persons of every nationality among our citizens, will view Mr. GREELEY entirely apart from his partisan connections on the one hand or on the other; or, if these have any influence, it will be in the disgust which his deliberate treachery excites among former opponents, as well as among former friends. In the main, it will be Mr. GREELEY's personal characteristics, his peculiar views and his habits of thought, fixed by a life-time of obstinate contention, that will determine the attitude of sensible men, Germans, as well as others, toward him.

In Mr. GREELEY personally, Germans as a class can find little to sympathize with. He has always shown himself peculiarly illiberal and bigoted toward them, with reference to many of their national customs. As a race they are notoriously fond of the moderate use of tobacco and mild malt drinks and wines. They detest spirits and drunkenness as heartily as Mr. GREELEY himself, but they are accustomed to lager, and like it. Mr. GREELEY, however, during a long service as public speaker and writer, has ignored these obvious distinctions. To him tobacco and all "alcoholic beverages" are inventions of the Evil One; species of poison which no sane man ever would indulge in, and the enjoyment of which was a sign of pure moral obliquity. His biographers relate that he himself was born with a strong antipathy to all forms of liquor and to tobacco. The smell or taste of them were peculiarly repulsive to him. That settled the vexed question of stimulants with him for all persons under all circumstances. What he could not tolerate he would hold intolerable to all the world beside, and since his stomach was equally disturbed by New-England rum and Rhine wine, by London stout or Bavarian beer, he could not help classing them together as alike physically injurious and morally destructive. Every incident, every statement, correct or incorrect, every argument, sound or foolish, which told against tobacco and stimulating drinks, he seized upon with avidity, and everything on the opposite side of the question he ignored. His antipathy to tobacco did not, however, prevent him from joining TWEED in a "Tobacco Manufacturers' Association," as the official records prove. But if any German chose to smoke a pipe or drink a glass of lager, he was denounced by Mr. GREELEY as a swill-tub, a wet, a fool, &c., &c. He would close every "garden" in the City, and make lager-beer drinking a penal offense.

The Democratic candidate is, in truth, highly unpopular with the Germans, and as there is nothing to counteract their dislike of him—as his position as a partisan candidate is absurd, and his pretensions as a statesman are simply contemptible—the boast of his German strength is pure balderdash. It is true that Mr. CARL SCHURZ has been persuaded to leave his tent and his ease, and accept the nomination of Mr. GREELEY. But in doing so he had the aid of powerful personal resentment, and a sense of personal pique toward Gen. GRANT, to overcoming the dictates of his better judgment. Other Germans are not so situated. Nothing can prevent them from seeing that as a politician Mr. GREELEY has shown himself untrustworthy, while as a man and a journalist, he has proven himself, especially toward them, unreasonable, proscriptive, and fanatical.

The Democratic Candidate and Ex-War Citizen.

It will be profitable for the Democracy, now that they have selected a political opponent as their candidate for President, to recall the only similar incident which is to be found in our history. Every schoolboy knows that in the first division of our people into political parties they were known as Republicans and Federalists, the former being the predecessors of the Democratic Party, but the latter, passing out of existence and leaving nothing behind them which could be made available in future political action. The antagonism between these parties grew out of the alien and sedition laws, which became so unpopular with the people that THOMAS JEFFERSON, the most distinctive of Republicans, was elected President in 1800, and again in 1804. The Federalists made another desperate effort in 1808, to regain power, but were badly defeated by JAMES MADISON, JEFFERSON's Secretary of State.

Here had been three successive defeats, and at the end of Mr. MADISON's term the Federalists would have been twelve years out of power, just as the Democracy now have been. The Federalists, therefore, raised the cry of "free-trade and sailors' rights" as popular catch-words, and although there was very general doubts of their sincerity, they managed with it to exhibit some signs of reviving life. But events marched more rapidly than they wished, and before the election of 1812, being brought squarely to the issue they had been instrumental in creating, they flinched from it. War with England being imminent as a consequence of their shibboleth, they naturally turned about, opposed the war, and became more unpopular than ever.

In this strait they were forced to an extraordinary expedient. At that time there was a Mayor of New-York who had already become famous as a man of fertile intellect, advanced Republican views, and great political ambition. He had always acted with the party of JEFFERSON; but, being Mayor of New-York, he imagined that it would be popular in this commercial community to oppose the war with England, and he cut loose from his party on that issue. The Federalists thought they saw in him an opportunity to return to power by the division of the Republican Party, and therefore made him their candidate for President in 1812. Without pretending so recent any of his political opinions, DE WITT CLINTON, the Republican, bore the standard of Federalism to ruinous defeat. Thereafter, the party which had chosen him as a last resort disappeared from American history. Except during the four years of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, the party which had crushed the Federalists under the lead of DE WITT CLINTON held power constantly down to March 4, 1841, and broken only by the eight years from which HARRISON and TAYLOR were elected, down to March 4, 1861.

There is much of suggestion in these facts which lie upon the surface of American history. The philosophy of them is equally apparent. There has never been any doubt that the extinction of the Federalists was due not so much to their taking an unpopular side in a great crisis, as to that utter abandonment of principle shown by their taking a candidate from the opposite party for the sake of expediency. Let the Democrats take warning from this episode of our political history.

Education in England.

It is scarcely going beyond the truth to say that during the last five years more has been done for the cause of education in England than during the preceding five hundred. Up to five and twenty years ago, almost the only chance of instruction open to the rural poor was in a village school supported by the liberality of the principal land-holder of the parish, and a payment of one penny or twopence a week on the part of the child's parents. Then came a system of Government grants, under certain conditions, but still a large proportion of the rising generation remained destitute of all education. About four years ago, some startling revelations were made as to what was known as the "gang system" in the east of England. It was the habit of certain persons, called "gang masters," to contract with land-holders for the performance of work during the summer and Fall, and to go about the country with gangs of laborers, who carried out the work under their superintendence.

Reports having become rife as to the alarming absence of morality and religion among these gangs, a Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry issued, and a very startling state of things was revealed. A condition nearly amounting to Free Love appeared to be prevalent, and education was entirely neglected. The women and boys worked in the fields with the men, and became wondrously strong and healthy, but when the former bore children they deemed them an encumbrance, and put them out to nurse. That nurse with whom most died was the most popular, and the consumption of sedative and soporific drugs in the district was proved to be enormous. Legislation followed with the view of checking some of the salient evils of the gang system, and recently a very important measure, known as "the Agricultural Children's bill," has been introduced with similar ends. By its provisions children under ten must prove 250 attendances at school before they are allowed to work, and they are absolutely forbidden, if under ten, to work in gangs. There can be no doubt of the general anxiety prevalent in England now to educate the working classes. The great difficulty lies in convincing the humbler class of parents of the necessity of education for their children, whom they prefer making money out of as the earliest possible age. In Ireland an admirable education has for many years been provided for all at the public expense. The reason that Irishmen and women reach our shores in such deep ignorance, and therefore become the law-breakers and murderers par excellence of the community, may be found in the fact that the Irish Government schools, being secular, and not under ministers of religion, are opposed by the priesthood.

Lunatics and Asylums.

It is not alone in the pages of novelists that horrible stories so often come to light of the treatment of the insane, or of those who are charged with being insane, in asylums. The perpetrators of ordinary crimes escape in a varying ratio, as is well known, without punishment. Despite our detectives and our telegraphs a certain number of thieves and murderers and incendiaries, but for the stings of conscience, get off scot free. Of the people who keep homes for lunatics, and who either abuse them, or lend themselves for money to a misrepresentation of the true mental condition of their patients, probably a larger proportion than the average of other offenders have thus evaded all earthly retribution. The proportion may indeed be diminished of late years, since public attention has been strongly drawn to the subject—a good work, in which some prominent writers of fiction have done noble service. Still, even now, the secrecy with which such custodians of lunacy are enabled to shroud their actions, the sharp temptations to which they are often exposed, and the singular difficulty, even for experts, in determining the shades and degrees, and even reality of mental aberration, render the subject one that can hardly be too carefully handled or too rigidly scrutinized.

Of course there is great danger that the physician or keeper may be unfairly suspected or even grossly maligned. Naturally, we are made most familiar with cases working the other way. Yet it often happens that highly honorable men of the medical profession are gravely doubted and sometimes seriously injured in this manner. An odd case of the kind happened in this neighborhood a year or two ago. An Englishman afflicted with intermittent weakness of intellect, and having at all times in his composition certain streaks of preternatural cunning, came to this country in charge of a respectable physician. The patient was quite harmless as a general rule, and any impending exception could readily be apprehended and guarded against by his experienced companion. Sometimes it was necessary to restrain him by force, and usually some slight pressure was needful to deter him from certain follies and excesses. Yet he could be trusted, during his more lucid intervals, in general society, and few would suspect on such occasions anything worse than a slight and not unpleasing eccentricity. While traveling in the interior this patient broke out into violence and was, as usual, promptly attended to by the physician. Recovery was speedy in this instance and, prompted by some caprice, the unfortunate gentleman insisted on being relieved of his companion's presence. The latter had accepted his charge under very rigid instructions from friends in England and refused, of course, to comply with the other's wishes. On this, the patient, proceeding with remarkable gravity and self-possession, managed to see a lawyer, and made an appeal to the local Courts. The result was that the doctor was ordered to relinquish the custody of the complainant, and the latter went roaming over the country at large. In a few weeks the lunatic was arrested in a Southern city for setting several buildings on fire and committing other outrages, and his medical attendant, who was placed in a most humiliating and painful position by the action of the Court, was appealed to to come on and take his patient—who, by this time was unmistakably crazy again—once more into safe-keeping.

In spite of this example the power of appeal to enlightened and tender authority ought always to be within the reach of the insane, whether of the intermittent sort or not. The case we have cited is exceptional, but probably in all similar instances a patient would be able to ask for an investigation of his true condition. In asylums the facility is apt to be more restricted, and sometimes to a shameful extent denied. A regulation lately adopted in Belgium, and which bears upon this point, might wisely be put in universal practice. It appears that a lunatic girl who had effected her escape from an asylum at Brussels, made her way to the Office of the Procureur du Roi, an officer having legal authority over such institutions and asked whether he had received letters from her complaining of the treatment she was subjected to at the asylum. No such letters had arrived and the keepers at the asylum denied that any such had ever been written. As a consequence of this adventure the Procureur du Roi has ordered that hereafter in all lunatic asylums, wherever, strong and safely-shut letter-boxes shall be provided, accessible to all the inmates, and to be opened only by his own subordinates who shall visit them regularly every week, and promptly deliver the letters addressed to him.

Saratoga Blackmail.

One of the most unpleasant of the many extortions to which sojourners at American watering-places have to submit, is that of the hackmen. The overcharges of these gentry in the City are proverbial, but compared with the unblushing impositions of their country cousins, they are as the stealings of a an ordinary defaulter to the peculations of a Tweed. Thus, except to owners of private equipages, or persons of large fortune, one of the greatest attractions and benefits of country life is practically denied. A daily drive at Saratoga or Niagara at prevailing prices, would be impossible for any but a Croesus, or better, perhaps, a "Midas-ears care and all."

Of almost all our fashionable Summer resorts, this is true. But probably in an special degree of two we have named. And Saratoga's particular sinning in this direction, the late visit of the Seventh Regiment has brought into unflattering prominence. Camp Sherman was pitched at Glen Mitchell, about a mile and a half from the village, and between the two points, during the period of the encampment, there was of course uninterrupted travel. This even at fair rates would have insured to the hackmen a bountiful harvest. Such rates the regiment were able to enforce so far as they were concerned. But the people at the hotels had no such resource, and were consequently charged prices that even a New-York John might have been ashamed to exact. Five dollars was the lowest rate for this mile and a half drive in the morning, and six, in the evening. Unsuspecting innocents, who ventured without a previous contract, were charged even higher.

Now for this sort of imposition, however exasperating, it is illogical to blame the hackmen themselves. They only follow a general impulse of human nature in desiring to get as much as possible more than the worth of their labor. The true responsibility falls directly on the hotel-keepers and indirectly on the town authorities, who neglect to regulate the matter on an equitable basis. The place lives on its Summer visitors, and this, which, ought, it would seem, to secure the patrons a certain amount of fair dealing, is the reason coolly assigned for fleecing them out of all conscience. "One must make hay while the sun shines," cry these honest Saratogans, "and as the sun shines here but a quarter of the year you must pay for our hay just four times its value." On the same plea a city tradesman might charge exorbitant prices for one-half the year because he wished to live in idleness for the other half.

In the main, for this sort of extortion the hotel-keepers are chiefly to blame. They really control the hackmen, whose patronage comes almost wholly from the hotels. Their customers look to them—and they certainly pay enough to justify the expectation—for protection from outside imposition at least. What is the result? Take Congress Hotel for example—an hotel in many respects well kept, where the attendance is good, the table better than usual, the clerks even curiously civil. Its "guest"—to use the familiar but facetious euphemism—finds in his room a circular admonishing him to ask for carriages at the office. He does so, and is referred to a certain magnate of hacks outside, who has a practical monopoly of the business. This dignitary on being applied to calmly fixes his rate at some incredible figure. The victim, doubting his ears, appeals to the desk, and is told with professional tranquillity that this is the regular rate. So that he has no choice but to submit to the extortion, or else go without his drive.

It is things like these that give to American watering-places their unsavory reputation. And it is only when people make up their minds in this and like cases to sacrifice comfort to principle, that such impositions can be stopped. Some day such a revolution will take place, and then the harpies of the springs and sea-side who now fatten on the inexperience or the vanity of their victims will suddenly find their occupation gone.

Pickles and the "Can-Can."

Active participation in the manufacture of pickles—at least in hot weather—inspires, it seems, a desire to dance the can-can. This interesting fact was demonstrated, the other day, in the pickle warehouse of Messrs. CROSBY & BLACKWELL. On the famous premises in Soho-square, no fewer than one hundred damsels labor, it seems, at the manufacture of those esteemed condiments. A warm day in June, and the temporary absence of the manager tempted the pickle-making nymphs to their sports. Two or three of them inaugurated the festivities by some choice illustrations of that dance which is regarded as least reputable, and speedily infected the whole company with the same Terpsichorean fever. Consequently, when the respectable Mr. JOHN HOPKINS came back from round the corner—where, no doubt, he had been having his bread and cheese and his beer—he became the witness of a very extraordinary spectacle. He beheld, with horror-stricken eyes, the hundred young women, who should have been soberly bottling the alluring gerkin and the no less ravishing small onion, leaping madly high in air, and exemplifying, so far as their natures and long petticoats would allow, the naughty fascinations of "Mabille" or the "Black Crook."

This was too much for the decorous soul of JOHN HOPKINS to bear. That these detailed maidens, these paid servants of his master, should be thus cutting capers instead of pickling them, was "most intolerable and not to be endured." He rushed wildly into their midst, like Sheridan amid the incantations of the Freischutzes, and ordered them in thunder tones straightway to desist. Then followed a slight scuffle, in consequence, and as nearly from the "naso and rupture" of the can-can to the "hiss and langouro" of pickles. Of course there were mutual heart-burnings and revilings, and the manager thought it his duty to report the affair to his superiors. After this, JOHN HOPKINS went round the corner again to "recuperate," but on his return he found a flow in his path in the form of JOHN HODGES. The latter is the husband, it appears, of one of the dance-loving pickle-makers, and she had complained of being insulted. Politely pushing his action by a statement to this effect, Mr. HODGES now proceeded artistically to black Mr. HOPKINS' eyes; and the drama wound up the next morning in Bow-street, where Mr. HODGES deposited a small pecuniary consideration for the luxury he had enjoyed. The moral to be deduced is plain—to avoid interference with votaries of the can-can, when it is possible that they may have husbands in the best greenery. Another and more subtle lesson is also derivable from our tale, which is, Let those who would not be tempted to indulge in objectionable dances, beware of pickle-making in the dog-days.

Grumbling and Grumblers.

Many years ago, a well-known New-Yorker, then staying in Dublin, received a visit from a distinguished Irish friend. "How do like your hotel?" quoth the latter. The American forthwith made revelations impugning the character of the establishment seriously in various respects. "Good heavens!" rejoined the Irishman. "I hope you kicked up a devil of a row about it?" "No." "Why?" "Oh, we Americans never complain." "Oh, but we Irishmen do." And, forthwith, the Irishman rang the bell, and thundered forth remonstrances which might have been heard across Sackville-street, and secured his friend what French letter-writers call "distinguished consideration" for the remainder of his visit. The truth is, that not complaining when there is just cause for complaint, is a form, and an aggravated form, of moral cowardice. Every reformer has been a grumbler. There was JOHN HAMPDEN, a sad, obstinate fellow, who, CLARENDON tells us, had ample means, yet positively refused, "on principle," to pay a few shillings illegally levied by the Sainted CHARLES. "A cantankerous brute," said the gay cavalier; yet to JOHN HAMPDEN the Englishman of 1872 stands indebted for his freedom. So with our own country; but for those grumbling citizens who threw over the tea in Boston harbor, should we have had an Independence Day to celebrate last week?

Passing to the immediate subject of this article, there is nothing on which vigorous and sustained, and even angry grumbling, is more requisite than the hotel nuisance. A great many rich people probably overlook the fact that the system at present in vogue positively debars almost every one with an income under $10,000 a year from having a sea-side holiday at all, or at all events having it with the faintest degree of comfort. Take the case of a man with a wife and three children—the charge will be, for second-rate accommodations, $20 a day, and if in this hot weather they should indulge in even the modest luxury of a glass of lemonade apiece per diem, the bill will be $148 75 a week; and this without wines, spirits, laundry bill, boats, carriages, &c.

If we had chanced to have a little more grumbling five years ago, probably our taxes in New-York would not be quite so high as they are today. Possibly, too, our Fiaks and Goulds would not have been quite the potentates which they became—the rulers under whom we quailed, and, indeed, quail today. Righteous, well-directed, long-sustained grumbling is apt to assume the form of that great power, a healthy public opinion, and that is a political engine which sweeps rings and robbers before it, as ruthlessly as the Nile rolls over the flats of Egypt.

If we grumble long, loudly, and decidedly, we shall put down the discomforts and extortions even of hotels; and so retain among us a large number of the most refined and educated of our population, who now, although dreading the voyage, pass their Summer abroad, and spend there a vast deal of money. But we shall not do it by lamb-like submission, while Boniface pins the fleece.

SUMMARY OF AMUSEMENTS.

City Amusements.

The announcements for the present week promise, for the season, unusual activity. Mme. Peschka-Leutner is to sing in three concerts at the Academy of Music, the first of which will occur to-morrow. The Yokes are to-morrow to reappear at the Union-square Theatre. "Notre Dame," a drama founded upon Victor Hugo's well-known novel, is to be produced at Wood's. At the Olympic, a new "sensational act," performed by Mlle. Geraldine, is expected to startle the audience. There will be no change of bill at Wallack's.

Home Notes.

Mme. Matilda Heron is about to profit by a benefit performance in San Francisco. Mlle. Aimée's debut in San Francisco was most successful. She is at the California Theatre. The old Board of Directors of the Boston Theatre has been re-elected.... Mr. Placide Cannonge, the new director of the New-Orleans Opera-house, has left for Europe, to engage a French dramatic company for the season of 1872-3, the French-speaking population of New-Orleans having readily answered the call to subscribe to this portion of Mr. Cannonge's enterprise. The question of an opera company is still open, and awaits the decision of those who may desire the perpetuation of the lyrical drama in New-Orleans. Thus far the "opera" has contained subscriptions amounting to about $20,000, more than one-half of the sum required to secure the underwriting against any failure or deficit, even if the expensive administration of the late opera company is to be taken as a criterion," says the Picayune.... Mr. McKee Rankin and his company were last week in Minneapolis.... Mr. Lawrence Barrett was at Iaqua on the Virginia City, Nevada, 7th, in a sensational drama called "La Superba" was acted, with Miss Dunn in the leading part, at the Arch-street Opera-house, in Philadelphia, last week.

Foreign Affairs.

M. Victorien Sardou, the brilliant author of "La Rat Castle" and "Rabagas," was married on June 25, in the Chapel of the Versailles Palace, to Mlle. Sculo. A great many dramatic authors and journalists and some Deputies, were present at the ceremony. The President of the Republic was invited, but he sent an excuse.... M. Chevalier Buisonnier, manager of the Folies Opera at Warsaw, died there on the 20th inst. Buisonnier was remarkable for his great admiration for his famous compatriot, "Balfe," produced at Warsaw on the 1st of January, 1846. The success achieved by his work supplied the composer with the means of learning acquaintance with his enthusiastic admirer. Mr. Balfe visited Warsaw, where he was introduced to Franz Liszt, while in Paris he made the acquaintance of Rossini and Meyerbeer. On returning home, he entered on the management of the opera. The greater part of his compositions consisted of operettas, melodramas, &c. It is to his patriotic zeal that he gained his position of a national composer. Buisonnier was buried on the 6th ult. The ceremony, in which, at least 100,000 persons took part, began at 1 P. M., and lasted till 6 in the evening. The first artists took it in turns to carry the coffin. Bilse's Orchestra performed Chopin's "Dead March." So imposing a funeral had not been seen for years. The family of the deceased are left in very straitened circumstances.... Of Mlle. Parepa-Rosa, who was to sing in "Norma" at Covent Garden, in London, on July 4, the Opinione newspaper says: "At Covent Garden the performance of 'Don Giovanni' reintroduced Mme. Parepa-Rosa to an Italian audience, after an absence of some half-dozen years. The part of Donna Anna, one of the most esteemed in the operatic repertory, afforded her full opportunities for the display of her high qualities. Mme. Rosa has lost nothing in purity and freshness of voice; she has gained much in dramatic power. The broad view which she takes of the character another has to assign as a result of tragic interest, while her attention to details, her exquisite phrasing, and the delicate finish of her vocalization show her to be a master of the technique of her art. The applause of her auditors, contending with the Don was long and loud. But Mme. Rosa sacrificed her acknowledgment of the ovation to dramatic propriety. Subsequently in the course of the evening, she was twice recalled, and the demonstrations of approval were as liberal as they were well deserved. In the 'Ot sei che Tamagno' she reminded us much of the Grisi of old; and both her acting and singing were singularly natural and unaffected, and so far as her personation of Donna Anna goes, quite from the pen of the critic who ranks with the highest rank so apt to acquire. If Mme. Rosa can hardly hope to surpass admiration here as she has done in America, she may be quite sure of holding her own against any rivals."

A NEW ENGLISH PLAY.

The London Times of June 29 says: "On Saturday afternoon Mr. Edward Hastings repeated an experiment which he tried, several times in the course of last year—that is to say, he tested the merits of a new play by the effect produced on what is called a 'morning' audience. He has on this occasion been even more than usually successful, and we may fairly expect that in due time Mr. C. Osborne's drama, the 'Old Forge,' will take its place in some regular evening programme, instead of being played once and away at an abnormal hour by a company selected from various houses. The story is entirely of the domestic kind. Tubal Wright, (Mr. John Clarke,) a blacksmith of no uncommon type, rough in manners and sound in principle, is enjoying a life of happiness under difficulties. He has a sister Martha, (Miss M. Rhodes,) upon whom he dotes, and whom he betroths to Martin Rack, (Mr. H. S. Haynes,) a farmer. He has a distant cousin, Guzzy, (Mr. Powell,) a boy supposed to be illegitimate, and feels infinite satisfaction when he has nearly thrashed Mr. Wolkins, (Mr. Maclean,) the lad's school-master, for reproaching him with his misfortune. Lastly, he has an amiable and devoted wife, Peggy, (Miss M. Oliver,) who looks upon him as the best creature in the world, smooths down the occasional ruffles in his temper, and, to the best of her ability, removes from his path anything which has a semblance of discomfort. All this felicity is, however, marred to some extent by the circumstance that Tubal is not ready with his quarter's rent, and the reflections caused by this pecuniary difficulty not unnaturally lead to the conclusion that money and bliss are identical. Martin, indeed, helps him when his landlord's agent is about to 'sell him up,' but then Martin himself is likewise behindhand, and, receiving news of his uncle's death, he sets off sooner than a voyage to Australia. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that when news is brought by Mr. Cyrus Kite, (Mr. A. Wood,) a good-humored lawyer, to the effect that through the death abroad of one cousin Tom, Tubal has come into possession of £60,000, the mind of the blacksmith is somewhat taken from its equilibrium. A year elapses; Tubal has taken a handsome mansion in the neighborhood of his old forge, but money has not increased his happiness. On the contrary, he devotes his days to the maintenance of a state of surly inebriety, in which he is powerfully assisted by his old friends the public-house, now his constant companion; confirms himself in a belief that Martin is not good enough for Martha, and altogether makes himself so thoroughly disagreeable that even Peggy begins to think that he is not quite such a perfect being as he was when he had not a shilling in his pocket. Martin, now a thriving man, goes so far as to tell Martha that he looks upon her brother as 'a drunkard and fool,' and Martha, on one occasion, irritated beyond endurance, records in Tubal's presence this unfavorable opinion. The consequence is that Tubal, after indulging in potations more than usually liberal, at his favorite hostelry, the 'Crown,' contrives to pick a quarrel with Martin, and to pitch him from a bridge into a mill-stream, thus at once avenging an insult and preventing a settlement. When the blacksmith has somewhat recained his senses, of which he has, however, anything but a firm hold, he is as miserable as possible. He knows that he has behaved very badly, and has done something very wrong, but he is far from a clear knowledge of the precise nature of his offence; and finding himself once more in his old forge, begins to think that he has never really left it, but has merely been troubled by an ugly dream, though when he is disenvered by his faithful Peggy he is somewhat puzzled by her smart attire. The real state of the case is, however, revealed to him by Wolkins, who, having irritated 'the sons of the multitude,' tells him plainly that he is a murderer, to the great horror of Peggy, who overhears the conversation. Vindictive as he is on account of the old assault, Wolkins is willing to sell silence for a valuable consideration, and a bargain would be struck between him and the wretched Tubal, did not Martin Rack, who has been saved by Mr. Kite, arrive at that moment, to the delight of everybody except the school-master. Nor is the rescue of Martin the only benefit conferred by the lawyer upon the blacksmith. Mr. Kite has ascertained that Guzzy is illegitimate son of the deceased cousin, and consequently entitled to the £60,000. Tubal thus loses the fortune which had been a bane of misery, and, convinced that money is the root of all evil, rejoices to find himself a reformed character. That the 'Old Forge' inculcates no new moral need scarcely be observed. The truth that the poor man who thinks that his rich neighbor must be necessarily happy would probably be cured of his delusion were he aware of wealth, was a lesson taught ages ago by Horace and Lucian, and has lain at the foundation of many plays. Objection, too, may be made to the agency by which the clear, clear as it is, has been worked out. Martin's influence is hardly sufficient to account for an attempted murder, and Tubal's state of mind, when he meditates the events of a whole year for the incidents of a dream, is based on a psychological hypothesis which, without explanation, we are not bound to accept. But the merit of the play for practical purposes is beyond dispute, few characters on the modern stage affording better opportunity for excellent acting of the dramatic kind than Tubal and the wife Peggy. These the author has thought out and written up thoroughly, and his meaning has been perfectly understood by Mr. John Clarke and Miss M. Oliver, each of whom presents a picture worthy of the closest study. The innate sturdiness of the blacksmith and the mutality into which the sturdiness degenerates are admirably sustained, and there is an exceptionally fine point at the end of the first act, when Tubal, perplexed by the news of his sudden wealth, hesitates with Teste on a moment, as if his strong mental excitement could only be rendered endurable by increased physical vertigo. On the other hand, every phase in the character of gentle Peggy is depicted to the life by Miss Oliver. The good humor and affectionate devotion which intimately distinguish it, and the displays of deep agony, accompanied by a determination to look on the best side of things, however bad they may be, are fully shown, without the slightest deviation from the modesty of nature. The other parts were equally fitted on Saturday, the last being taken into consideration that the company had been struck together for one occasion only."

Personal.

Senator R. B. Fenton, of Jamestown, N. Y., Gen. Frank P. Blair, of Missouri, and Hon. W. H. Seward, of Albany, are stopping at the Fifth-avenue Hotel. Ex-Mayor J. M. Wightman, of Boston; Hon. Silas M. Martin, of Wilmington, Del.; Hon. T. A. Hendricks, of Indiana; Hon. T. B. Bonnell, of Washington, and George Francis Train, are at the St. Nicholas Hotel. Gen. Joel L. Terrell, of the United States Navy, have rooms at the St. Denis Hotel. Hon. E. M. Maddox, of Middletown, is at the St. James Hotel. Hon. E. S. Hubbard, of St. Louis, is at the Grand Hotel.

A CANAL TEA-PARTY.

One afternoon during my recent trip in the canal-boat Adriatic, over the Erie Canal, we got caught in a crowd of boats just below the locks at Newark. There was little prospect of our getting through before midnight, and I betook myself to pens, ink and paper in order to while away the time. I had been writing for about a couple of hours when Capt. Spoor slowly ascended the hatchway of the main cabin. For a few seconds he stared at me with the half-perplexed, half-mysterious look which at times is peculiar to him. His hesitating manner, and the fact that he was arrayed in a clean white shirt and his Sunday trowsers and waistcoat—and on a week-day too—quickly aroused my curiosity, and I wondered what was coming. The Captain at last succeeded in working himself up to the scratch, and, having rolled his quid of tobacco from one cheek to the other, he jerked out "Do me a favor," as one word, as though he were afraid to trust the words to come out one at a time, lest he should break down. "Certainly, Captain, if it be in my power," I replied. "What is the nature of it?" The Captain ascended two steps of the cabin staircase, shut the double doors and closed the hatch with as little noise as possible and with an air of considerable mystery, and then seating himself opposite to me on a wooden stool, stared at me with the utmost gravity without uttering a word. "Well, Captain," said I, well aware hanging, "you'll have to open the ball. I can't do aught for you." With an evident effort and with the aid of a copious expectoration, the Captain began. "Fact is, me and another man's got a little business on hand which we can't quite fix to our liking. 'S boat's three above; seen him 's afternoon." And there the Captain stopped with a sigh of relief, as though he had imparted to me all the information that was necessary. "Do you want me to give you some advice, or to arbitrate some little matter of difficulty between you?" I inquired. "Taint it," he replied, "taint nothin' o' the sort. We wants you to write a letter for us. It come about just this: I was a tellin' Cap'n Joe—that's him—as I had a greenhorn aboard. 'What the h—ll's he dun' o'?' says he. 'Writin' newspapers,' says I. 'Writin' newspapers!' says he; 'why, d—n me if he ain't just the chap for us. He'll fix the letter if we pays him for't. He'd do't for fifty cents, may be a quarter.' 'Don't think as he would,' says I. 'Shouldn't like to ask him. Fifty cents ain't Lothin' to him.' 'Then ask him to do it as a favor,' says he. 'We shan't get through the locks afore midnight; S'pose you and him comes aboard to supper; and tell him I've got some tip-top old Bourbon aboard.' 'I'll do it,' says I; 'by —— I'll do't.'" And there, as if astonished at the energy and diplomatic ability he had displayed in the matter, he exclaimed as he brought his fist down on the table, "An' d—n me, if I ain't done it, too." Of course I willingly consented to act as their amanuensis for the nonce; and so delighted was Capt. Spoor at having shifted the burden of writing the important letter (he told me confidentially that the other Captain could not sign his name) from his own shoulders to mine, that he skipped about the deck for the remainder of the afternoon in a state of feverish anxiety for supper-time to arrive.

At 6 o'clock to the minute, we stood on the deck of Capt. Joe's boat, and a fat puffy little man who was seated on the top of the cabin slowly gathered himself up and waddled forwards to receive us. "Capt. Joe," said Capt. Spoor, in as dignified a tone as he could assume; "make you acquainted to Mr. —— man I told you of." Considerable education. Readin' and writin' 's nothin to him. Says he'll do't." Capt. Joe held my hand in a vice-like grasp while he gasped out, "Happy to meet you." went through a severe fit of coughing, and shed copious tears. I was a little nonplussed at the weeping. But I had not been long in Capt. Joe's company before I discovered that he suffered from the chronic stomach cough peculiar to very fat men, and that an attack of it always brought the water into his eyes. "What is his name?" I whispered to Capt. Spoor. "Joe: didn't you hear me say Joe?" responded the Captain aloud. Knowing the Captain's singular and invincible dislike to the use of surnames, I thought it was useless to venture the inquiry, and let the matter drop.

Capt. Joe had recovered himself, and was wheezily gasping out his thanks to me for taking their business in hand, when a tawny-faced, slipshod woman, the very opposite of Capt. Joe, for she was tall, lean and scraggy, bobbed up the cabin stairs, called out "Supper" in a harsh voice and disappeared immediately, as though she disliked the light as much as an owl. Capt. Joe echoed "Supper" to the steersman and drivers who were off duty as loudly as his physical economy would permit. Capt. Spoor hauled up a bucket of water, in which we all rinsed our already well-washed hands, and then we went down into the cabin. All the culinary resources of Capt. Joe's ménage had evidently been called into requisition for the occasion. The table literally groaned under its load of good things; more were on the little ledge which, standing out from the cupboard, did duty as a sideboard, and still more were being kept hot on the top of the cooking-stove. There was an immense supply of portentous steak and peeled ham and eggs floating in a sea of grease deep enough for ducklings to swim in. There were plates of raw onions, stewed apples, fried potatoes, cookies and molasses cake. There were huge piles of bread and hot biscuit, a tureen of butter that must have made a good-sized hole in the firkin from which it was taken, and a tin pot which contained about a gallon of boiling-hot weak tea. The ship-shod woman, a merry-eyed young girl about sixteen years of age, whose form and features proclaimed her the Captain's daughter, the steersman, and the driver, were already seated in solemn silence at the table when we entered the cabin. "My wife—all set," said Capt. Joe, by way of introduction, as he pointed with his thumb to the individuals in question. The "gal" dimpled her cheek and grinned from ear to ear; "my wife" bowed stiffly, and immediately proceeded to say grace. Capt. Joe looked at me as much as to say, "I am sorry, but I can't help it," and whispered audibly, "Member of a Church," by way of apology for his wife's adherence to principle. Mrs. Capt. Joe, as Capt. Spoor styled her, having brought back the whites of her eyes to their proper position, subsequently corrected the driver for calling a raw onion, while she was "invokin' the Divine blessin'," on the ham and eggs; for she bent her head so piously low over that particular dish as to preclude the idea that anything else on the table was included in her fervent appeal. Capt. Joe at once proceeded to cut the steak up into portions, his wife did the same with the broiled ham, and a very one helped himself to his liking, using the public carving-knife and his own fork in so doing. In total lieu the ordinary order of things is reversed. As the knife is the only implement which hostesses use for conveying their food to their mouths, social etiquette demands that their guests shall not use their own knives to helping themselves. This exclusion does not apply to the fork, which never finds its way to their mouths.

By the time every one had "assisted" himself to what he wanted, I perceived that something was causing Capt. Joe the greatest uneasiness. He glanced nervously at his wife, occasionally at Capt. Spoor, and angrily at his daughter. They either did not perceive his vexation or thought it better to take no notice of it. His patience, however, was at last exhausted; and, almost thrusting his knife down the throat of a fat trout, he gasped out, "Way in h—l—don't some of you—take the man's coat—from him!" On recovering a little from the effects of the sudden and unlooked-for explosion, I became alive to the fact that I was the only member of the company who did not appear in shirt-sleeves. At first, I hardly knew whether to apologize for wearing my coat or to insist on doing so. The "gal," however, gave me little time for deliberation. My coat was off my back long before her mother had finished a short sentence to the effect that "if anything and swearing, "which bad as I feels in sayin' on, said Mrs. Cap'n Joe, turnin' to me, "my man's to come led away to Sodom an' Gomorrah." I am sorry to say that Capt. Spoor winked most unsympathetically at Capt. Joe on hearing this stern rebuke of his evil habit, while, at the same time, he coughed a fearfully hypocritical cough to that gentleman's better half. The driver hurriedly swallowed a whole raw onion, almost entirely without mastication, and the steersman fortified himself with a hot biscuit and a vicarious application of his dirty blue-striped shirt-sleeve to his perspiring forehead. As for me, I looked from one to another and wondered what was coming next.

By way of a sheer to this little difficulty, I endeavored to draw the "gal" into conversation; but she replied to most of my remarks with a giggle, and to all my well-turned compliments with a "Pshaw," though she appeared to be highly gratified at my attentions to her. Not so, however, was the young steersman, who could scarcely conceal his vexation. He was a fine, good-looking young fellow, and had an eye to the "gal," as also to the boat, the house and lot in Germantown, and the few hundred dollars in the savings bank, which, in the course of nature, will become her personal property, she being Capt. Joe's sole heiress. The more I plied her with compliments the more her merry eyes danced with delight, the more she laughed, and the more the steersman frowned. She was evidently an arrant little flirt. In new circumstances her sour-visaged mother would have sternly rebuked her for her levity; but she far from favored the steersman's suit, and seemed to find malignant satisfaction in his discomfiture. As it was, she contented herself with mildly requesting her daughter to moderate her "goings on." This brought out Capt. Spoor, who most unceremoniously addressed his hostess as "Old Uppercrust," and asked her why she couldn't "let the gal enjoy herself." This sally threw Capt. Joe into such effervescent glee that he had a terrible fit of coughing. He would no more so have dared to encounter his lady's virtuous indignation than to produce his hidden whisky-bottle in her presence. His gratitude to his friend, therefore, for his vicarious effort was unbounded, the more so as it succeeded in driving the outraged lady to the tropical privacy of the kitchen, muttering between her teeth, "Some men has no manners." With diplomatic cunning the Captain sent the "gal" after her with a five-dollar bill and the suggestion that the two ladies should go on to Newark and buy any stores they wanted. Five minutes afterward the table was cleared, the ladies had departed, and the two Captains and I were sitting in solemn conclave round a bottle of whisky, a pitcher of ice-water and three tumblers.

I waited with some curiosity the opening of the business which had brought us there. To my astonishment I found that all the mystery was about a very simple matter. It appeared that the two Captains had had a little business transaction in Buffalo, in conjunction with a third party, to whom had been intrusted the management of the affair, and who, from what they had lately heard, they feared was playing them false. I suggested to them to demand of him an immediate and detailed statement of the state of affairs. In case he neglected or refused to furnish it, I advised them at once to apply for legal advice. "Capt. Joe!" said Captain Spoor, very solemnly, "see what 'tis to be a man of addication. He's hit it; by ——, he's hit it. Didn't I tell you readin' and writin' wasn't nothing to him?" The Captain was far too absorbed in a severe fit of coughing to reply otherwise than by pouring himself out a tumbler of whisky, pudding at me half a dozen times between his coughs, and then tossing it down at a gulp. When he had recovered himself a little, he expressed his full and entire approval of my suggestions. He produced from his trowsers pocket a brown envelope and a sheet of note-paper, which were so little crumpled and soiled from having lain hidden there all the afternoon. His wife knew nothing of the little speculation, and of course must be kept in ignorance of the sending of the letter. I quickly indicted a communication to the fraudulent partner, which Capt. Joe pronounced to be a "masterpiece" of writing. Capt. Spoor was equally delighted. "Ever do that afore?" he asked. I told him that I did not remember having ever written a similar letter. "Well! I want to know" he exclaimed.

The business of the evening having been got through, Capt. Joe lit a fresh pipe and declared his intention of having a good time of it till his wife returned. The young steersman was bribed with a drink to give due notice of her approach. By the time it was dark, Capt. Joe had got outside of about three parts of the bottle of whisky. Capt. Spoor being a very moderate man, and what with its fumes and many violent fits of coughing, he was fast approaching a disabled condition. He was tumbling in his pockets for some money in order to send out to buy another bottle, when the steersman called through the cabin window, "Woman's coming." Capt. Spoor and I as once seized our host and shot him bodily into his bunk, with the strict admonition that he should pretend to be asleep. We rinsed the glasses and replaced them on the table, so as to give the impression that we had been drinking iced water, dropped the empty bottle into the canal, and, covered by the increasing darkness, slipped over the stern of the boat just as Mrs. Capt. Joe and the "gal" were clambering up the bow.

One of the Victims of Rebel Barbarity.

The Saratogian tells the following sad story of the sufferings of a Union soldier during the war and since: "On the morning train, yesterday, Geo. A. McCall, a disabled veteran, arrived in Saratoga. He had left his wife and child temporarily at Ballston Spa, and came here for the purpose of securing help to carry himself and family to Litchfield, Conn., where he has not been for eleven years. In 1861 he enlisted in the One Hundred and Thirty-third N. Y. S. V., in which he served two years and five months. After which he enlisted in the Fifty-eighth Ohio, in which he served three years longer. On the 2d of June, 1864, at Cold Harbor, he was wounded twice, taken prisoner and sent to Andersonville, where he remained until released during these last days of the war. His recital of the horrors of that prison confirm the many statements already made. Under Waite he was reduced to a skeleton and was unable to stand on his feet. Two months previous to his release, as the results of starvation, abuse and exposure, he became insane. From that time up to within a few months since, everything remains a blank, and he knows nothing further of himself except what has been told him by others. It seems that his treatment made him insane, and when exchanged he was sent to Washington, D. C., and from thence to the Columbus (Ohio) Insane Asylum. This institution was subsequently destroyed by fire, when he was removed to the Cincinnati Asylum. At the latter place he remained until his recovery, and now, after an absence of eleven years, he is wending his way accompanied by his wife and child, to his old Connecticut home. Besides a wound in one of his limbs, his left arm is entirely disabled."

Activity in Shipbuilding Circles.

From the Baltimore Gazette, July 12.

For some months past there has been greater activity in the ship-yards than at any time since the close of the war. At Fells Point, there is some building going on, but the most important part of the work is the rebuilding and repairing of vessels. The yards on the south side of the basin have been very busy, and in all of them there are vessels undergoing repairs. The work of the Bennett line of steamers is now done at this port, and the George A. Pild is now receiving a new bottom at Reed's yard, and will be ready for service in a short time. There are a few new vessels of the smaller classes now on the stocks.

The Witch Wood Mystery.

William White and James Wightman, the burglars who, for two years past, have in so mysterious a way robbed the large wholesale houses in Thames and Wood streets, in one of which they were employed as porters, were arraigned at the Tombs Yesterday by Capt. Petty and Watchman Richard Field, of the Fifth Precinct. Arrangements were made against them by Messrs. Chapman, Smith & Co., and Steinhardt, Adler & Co., of Thames-street, and they were held for trial in $2,000 bail. Subsequently Wightman was tested by a man named James Potter, of No. 13 Abingdon-place.

ENGLAND.

British Brandreth—Expensive Amusements Where—The Question in Elections—Theatrical Gossip—Other Discussions.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Saturday, June 29, 1872.

I see that the managers of public works in the United States, in their recent reports to Congress, are of opinion that the operation of the Eight-hour law has been to encourage dissipation and intemperance, especially among the lower orders of workmen. The same thing seems to have been observed in this country. A committee of the House of Commons, which has been inquiring into the drinking habits of the people, has just reported that in large towns and populous districts the great evil of drunkenness is on the increase, which may be "attributed in some measure to the higher wages and shortened hours of labor." It is proposed that drunkards should be subjected to the following Draconic discipline: Any person getting intoxicated cautiously is to be fined two pounds, or sent to prison for thirty days; and the sentence is to be recorded, with the full name and address of the offender, in a Drunkards' Register. After three convictions in a year, the offender is to be called upon to find a surety for sobriety and good conduct for a fixed period, and in default thereof, or in case of the surety being forfeited by a fresh offence, he is to be locked up in an industrial reformatory for inebriates, where he would be put to hard labor. Inebriates will be allowed to enter these asylums voluntarily, if they like, but once in, "periods of months should not be allowed to leave, except under conditions to be laid down, and the power to prevent their leaving should be by law conferred on the managers." American experience appears to have weighed with the Committee in making these startling recommendations, but as the evidence is not yet published I can't say what the American precedents amount to. It seems that a couple of American witnesses were invited to give evidence, and that they sent in a bill for the costs of their journey to and from the States, although it was supposed they were visiting this country on their own account. They asked fifteen hundred pounds, and got something like a third of the sum. The Committee was very much disgusted with the sharp practice, which they think was played upon them, and there was at first some thought of refusing to pay the bill. But for fear, perhaps, of providing more work for the Tribunal at Geneva, the Treasury compromised the matter.

LONDON IN THE SEASON.

This has been a gay week in town, at both its extremities—in the east as well as the west. On Monday the Prince of Wales arrived to open a new museum at Bethnal Green, one of the poorest, dirtiest, and most wretched parts of London. He had a most flattering reception. The people turned out in their thousands, decked their houses in his honor, and cheered him lustily. It was not a got-up affair, with triumphal arches planned to order and built by contract. The people took the decoration of the route into their own hands, and many of them actually did the work themselves. It was impossible to doubt the sincerity and heartiness of the feeling which prompted the poor folk to furbish up their dingy dwellings with flower-pots, old carpets, garlands of colored tissue paper, and other cheap and gaudy embellishments in honor of the Prince and Princess. Among the inscriptions I saw "Thank you for your kind visit," and "Hearts across, though hands war offer," and this was the sentiment of the day. If anybody doubted the depth and reality of the popular attachment to the monarchy, he must have been undeceived on Monday last. It may be quite unreasonable and unphilosophical, but that it exists is undeniable. The truth is that in England the Republican movement is descending from above. The simple, superstitious faith of the masses still shines to the Crown. The Prince, who is getting decidedly fat, looks quite recovered from his illness, and the Princess, who is beginning to take the place of the Empress Eugenie as leader of the mode, is every day acquiring a more matured and exquisite beauty. The great feature of the Bethnal-green Museum is the famous and almost fabulously valuable Hertford collection of pictures, which has been lent for a year by Sir Richard Wallace. Sir Richard is the natural son of the late Marquis of Hertford, the eccentric hermit of Bagatelle, (a little villa overlooking the Longchampe Race-course at Paris,) who did against all the connoisseurs of Europe for masterpieces of art. Wallace was shut up in Paris during the siege, and his munificent exertions on behalf of the destitute and wounded are well known. In his care of the French he did not forget his own countrymen, many of whom, when their Lefaran bolted, were left in very painful and embarrassing circumstances. For his services in this respect Wallace received the thanks of the Government and a Baronetcy. He has taken out letters of naturalization in this country, where he intends to reside with his family, and there is some talk of his going into Parliament. He is so popular just now that he would have no difficulty in getting a seat in the House of Commons; but he will, probably, be offered a Peerage. Tuesday the Duke of Edinburgh gave a garden party, which was a very "jolly" affair; the host being both a bachelor and a sailor seemed to give a free and easy tone to the gathering, which was as merry as a junketing of shop-girls at Greenwich Hill. On Thursday, Miss Fox, daughter of a nameless foreign nobleman of the first rank, and adopted daughter of Lady Holland, was married to Prince Aloys Liechtenstein. It was the grandest marriage not only of the year, but of years, in London, and next to a royal wedding in brilliance and distinction. It quite threw the Marquis of Bute's marriage into the shade. It has not failed to be observed that Archbishop Manning officiated on both these occasions, and it is hinted that the prospect of such a noble wedding will be apt to produce a rare crop of fair perverts, unless the Archbishop of Canterbury bestirs himself to make Protestant marriages more gay and gorgeous. Absolutely the whole fashionable world of London was present on the day of Miss Fox's marriage, either in the cathedral, or at the breakfast, or at the garden party afterward.

THE THEATRES.

Two of England's most accomplished actors, perhaps I should say the most accomplished actors in England, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wigan, are about to retire from the stage, when unhappily there appears to be no one to take their places. On Saturday next they take their farewell benefit at Drury-lane. Mr. John S. Clarke, the American actor, who returns to the United States in about a fortnight, and who has been playing Illapod and Doctor Pangloss with great success, has just added Paul Pry to his repertory. A comedy called the "Under-graduate" has been produced at the Queen's Theatre, with something more than moderate success—in fact, it was tolerated, rather than applauded, and in parts hardly tolerated. It is not a bad play, but it has the disadvantage of being composed of familiar incidents from well-known pieces, and has a flavor of recollections about it which spoils its effect. Then it was played before an audience largely composed of young gentlemen from Oxford and Cambridge, who resented the slightest departure from what they considered the actual life of Alma Mater. It is very difficult to get sapers as a few shillings a week to represent with much exactness the dons of an English university. The plot of the piece is simply this: A wicked Baroness in order to be revenged on a family by whom he thinks he has been slighted, induces a proposal of marriage to be addressed to the eldest son of the family, who is a student at Oxford, to run off with a bar-maid with whom he is violently in love. He has no sooner put this scheme in action than he discovers that the bar-maid is his own natural daughter, pursues the fugitives, and, obtaining an interview with the young man, threatens to shoot him unless he instantly marries the girl. The youth refuses, and the villain, after firing his pistols once or twice without effect, is informed that the couple are in fact privately married already. The bad Baroness repents and asks forgiveness, the lovers are made quite happy, and all ends well.

KINGDOM OF ITALY.

The Catholic Party and the Elections—An Approaching Anniversary—Franco-Italian Relations—Disturbances in the North—An Impromptu Trial.

From Our Own Correspondent.

FLORENCE, Saturday, June 29, 1872.

All hope of aid from foreign countries cut off, the Catholic party in Italy has resolved to take part in the next election of members of the Lower House of Parliament, and for some time past the clerical leaders have been organizing their forces for the fray. A few years ago, there was a single Deputy, Signor Raggio, of Sicily, fanatically devoted to the cause of the Pope, who labored hard in the Parliamentary body to defend the interests of the Vatican; now he is joined by an ingrateful task, for he was laughed at by the other members, and he finally resigned from political life. Now it is proposed to make a new effort, and muster a whole regiment of Papal warriors, so as to be able to present a bold front in the Deputies' Chamber. It is the only course for the Papal party to pursue, with the hope of gaining something, as it is also the only course by which opposition can be legally made. It is a yielding of the old position, which has been so obstinately held, and the first formal recognition by the Church of the new political status.

AN APPROACHING ANNIVERSARY.

A great many friends of the Pope are arriving at Rome, to take part in the demonstration of the 21st, the anniversary of the Pope's coronation, and the day when he enters the seventy-and-twentieth year of his Pontificate. Cardinal Hohenlohe has not arrived at the Vatican to make the promised visit; for, you will remember that that is the letter which he wrote to the Pope more than a month back, he said that although he was not permitted to represent the German Empire in the character of ambassador, he had long had a desire to come to Rome and kiss the Pope's foot; a gratification which he would not long deny himself.

FRANCO-ITALIAN RELATIONS.

The visit of the hereditary Prince and his wife to Berlin, and the part taken by them in a Protestant ceremony, is still the leading subject of newspaper discussions and of private conversations. The moral courage exhibited by the reigning family and actual Government of Italy, by this example of Christian charity and sympathy, must raise them higher than before in the respect of all those who hold a reasonable form of religious faith. But this close intimacy with Germany has given opportunity to French writers to remind Italy that, in the long run, this country has no reason to expect more of disinterested benevolence from the aggrandized Prussian power than she did before from her old enemy, or ally, the now humiliated France. The argument is that Germany will not be content until she has annexed the six millions of the same race, now subjects of the Austrian monarchy, and with Illyria and the port of Trieste, put her foot upon the shores of the Adriatic. The weakest dog of Italy could be broken easily by the strong power, and it would not be long before the Italian peninsula would become the wharf upon which the northern nation would carry on its commercial business with Asiatic countries. Such is the facile way in which speculative writers dispose of these questions and arouse new apprehensions. Per servir sempre, e sinceriarsi o vista. The country begins to feel that little dependence can be placed upon Jockey Club Generals and a lax and timid army, no matter how numerous, and that more of the stern spirit of the Swiss and Germans must enter into and quicken the nation. The Italians have at present little confidence in the French, and as the country is not strong enough yet to stand alone, it must prop itself up with the most eligible alliances. In spite of declarations to the contrary of the clerical party, there is no sign yet that political good sense fails the directors of public affairs.

THE SEASON—INUNDATIONS.

The season has been backward, with an unusual amount of cold and wet. We have only now the first days with a warmth like that of Summer weather. The great rainfall in the north of Italy has caused more damage than has been known for many years. The river Po has overflowed its banks and put under water a great many thousand acres of the most fertile lands in that region. The destruction of property is immense, and to this is added the loss of a number of lives. Subscriptions are coming in from cities and from individuals, which will cover but a small part of the loss, and the public benevolence of the country has been drawn upon lately in various ways, as different parts of the peninsula have been visited by calamity.

A RESIGNATION.

Signor Crispi, one of the best-known men in Italian public life, and for a long time the leader of the party of the Opposition in Parliament, has this week offered his resignation as Deputy, with the intention of leaving the political arena. Signor Crispi is a conspicuous member of the Republican party, and has seen the time when his aspirations for a place in the Ministerial circle had a good prospect of being satisfied. But within a few years events have taken such a turn as to discourage his hopes of preferment, and he is now best upon giving his attention to the law, and the private enterprises which have already contributed to his fortune.

AN IMPORTANT TRIAL.

In a chance encounter last Winter in an osteria near the Vatican, between some members of the National Guard and several of the half-military servants of the Pope, one of the latter was killed and two others wounded. The case has been in Court the past week, and the result of the trial has been the acquittal of the parties against whom the charge of killing was made. When the men were set at liberty they were received with acclamations by the populace in the square. Another case is to be brought before the Tribunal in the south of Italy before long. In a convent in Sicily, a few days ago, one of the nuns was found murdered in her bed. Evidence has been found to show that the act was committed by another nun, who had had for some time relations with a young priest, of which a child was the fruit, whose dead body was found outside the walls of the convent. The murdered nun was acquainted with the conduct of her companion, and had expostulated with her upon her indiscretion. The young priest has left that part of the country. Returning to the case of the Pope's military servant killed in the quarrel with the soldier of the Guard, it must be added that in the Tribunal anything that deserves the name of justice was hardly meted out. It serves to show, with what a feeling of deadly odium the late Government of Rome is regarded by that population, the fact that the jury rendered a verdict under the influence of fear and under the dictates of popular menace. Indeed, we are reminded of the justice of the Irish jury of New-York and the Democrats in Tammany Hall. A newspaper, which is one of the organs of the Government party, is in an article upon the extraordinary action of the jury in declaring the parties innocent when guilty, was prevented from the following strong remarks: "Meanwhile civilization, somewhat enfeebled, gathers the fruits of free institutions, the most grotesque of which, and even the most brutal, is that of the jury. Civilization has its pedantries also, and sometimes it makes a display of dishonesty and bad faith. It is proved by the invention of the system of juries, which renders illusory the protection of society and makes the magistracy an accomplice in its own atrocities, lessening and consecrating the injustice of the book. What a subject for never-ending laughter posterity will have, which, with nothing better to do, it studies the history of the Corbellaria Italiana." The verdict has been generally condemned by the organs of different parties, as an act subversive of justice, order and respect for the claims of legal authority.

ANGELICO.

OLD CHAPPAQUACK.

Gladdening of Southerners and Southrons—Old Horace Greeley Honored—Show of Old Hoss from Home.

Yesterday was a day memorable in the annals of Chappaqua. Horace Greeley, upon the favorable conclusion of the Convention at Baltimore, conceived the idea of a grand reception at Chappaqua, where such of the Democrats and southrons as might feel inclined could assemble and bury their "little hatchet." It was accordingly advertised and preparations made to receive the delegations which were likely to pay their respects, in response to the invitation. Horace went to Chappaqua on Friday night, and turned himself during the evening in walking around his possessions, and striking dramatic attitudes for the subsequent reception. The attitudes paid little attention to his gyrations, but his displays of "What he knows about farming" had prepared them for eccentricities of the most alarming nature.

The train which was selected as the most convenient by a majority of the excursionists, left New-York at 8:30 o'clock, from Forty-second-street Depot, and at that time about 100 assembled. Soon the bell rang, and the entire party were borne away toward the blissful abode of the Prince of Chappaqua.

Village after village was speedily passed, and at Bloomingville, the station next to Chappaqua, many of the party left the cars under the fond delusion that the destination was at hand; a man posted up on the hotel, "Omnibus for Sing Sing," probably aided in the temporary exit. Chappaqua next hove in sight and within a stone's throw of the depot, with arms outstretched, and an expression of benevolence and hospitality beaming from every feature, stood a figure, unique in design and brilliant in execution. It was Greeley. It was evident that he had prepared for the occasion with unusual care, and was laboring to create a sensation. He succeeded. The old white hat had been rescued from the garret, and although rusty with age, and as fashionable as any hat wrung from the inheritance of the rag-bag could be, it was in entire harmony with the features of its wearer. His coat was an opaque, tight and brassy, without tails, and in no wise calculated to interfere with

"The long, loping tread, which can tire
The hounds' deep bate, and hunters' fire."

It is unnecessary to mention that the "long, loping tread" is Dr. Greeley's. The trousers which the Democratic candidate for the Presidency wore deserve special mention, although they were not a la Brummel; and, indeed, could hardly be said to be in the height of fashion. Indeed, one leg was slightly shorter than its mate, and neither was long enough to conceal the elegant development of the owner's ankles. The pantaloons were black and baggy, and in contrast with the white vest and maroon neck-tie, added a grace to the classic finish of their owner beyond depiction. But the crowning glory of the apparel, although, in point of fact, below all, was the shoes. These were of well-tanned calf-skin, with broad, generous soles, and as they lay planked in the thick dust of the road elicited universal admiration.

But these "pomts" were taken in at a glance, and the entire party disembarking from the cars, made a rush from the platforms in response to the words: "Welcome to Chappaqua." Some of the Southerners reached Mr. Greeley first, and grasped his hand with an earnestness only equaled by their desire to obtain fat governmental offices, which his election would probably secure them. These guests crowded about Old Chappaquack, and nearly squeezed the life out of him in their immense efforts. Mr. Greeley stood the brunt well, and with a face glowing like a bruised pumpkin, received the congratulations of his visitors. It was obvious that remaining in the road all day would not do, and so Old Chappaquack took the lead, and strolled along past the Post-office and village school, and upon his own grounds. And here Mr. Greeley came the "Heathen Chinee" over his visitors, and with a smile, that was "child-like and bland," suggested that they accompany him in a tour through the premises to see "what he knows about farming." Most of them held the opinion that what he knew about farming could be told in very few words, but held their tongues and followed in his wake. The party, by a winding path, were led through a cow-pasture and glad to a pool of water among some rocks, where a tall, glassy-eyed Chappaquan stood with a club driving away the frogs. A pitcher was provided, and the Sage called upon every one to "take a drink." After discussing the merits of the liquid, a walk was taken to view a twenty-five-year-old cow, which venerable fossil has infested the locality longer than Old Chappaquack. Several of the tourists were curious to know if it was proposed to milk the cow, and if so, or bring her diet down to a fine thing. The Sage stated that the cow was one of the dearest things on earth to him, and that he was bound to feed and care for her until she had eaten her last straw and kicked at the last fly. She was a mild-mannered cow; never bolted her food, and had never kicked; and consequently did not feel the apprehensions nor concern of that old man of the story who said—

"How shall I escape from this terrible cow?
I will on the stile,
And continue to smile,
Which may soften the heart of this cow."

An attempt was made toward involving Old Chappaquack in a wood-chopping scheme, but he firmly, yet respectfully, declined. The Old Man of the Woods then led the way down a steep hill, through a piece of woods, where the evergreen leaves rendered it so slippery that the guests were piled up along the descent in the most promiscuous manner. Old Chappaquack entered it barely until an unlucky step sent him rolling into some stray heads over heels, into a blump of bushes. He quickly recovered himself, and finding that no bear suit of clothes remained unrigged, proceeded on his way rejoicing. The swamps were then visited, and the mysteries of the corn-field and mowing lot explained. An exciting discussion ensued concerning the best method of keeping grasshoppers away from potato vines. Mr. Greeley concluded that the best way would be to hire a man to watch them, in which opinion nearly the whole party concurred.

The bell announcing that lunch was prepared, the guests assembled beneath the shade of the grapevine, and partook of the collation, of which Miss Ida Greeley was the caterer.

At the close of the entertainment, Mr. Greeley being called to speak, alluded to his farming interests, but made no mention of his turn-coatism in politics. He was followed by Senator Gwin, of California, who delivered a long winded oration upon the brilliant prospects of the Democratic Party, and eulogized Mr. Greeley in the most fulsome manner. Judge Reagan, of Texas, formerly Postmaster-General of Jefferson Davis, in the days of the Confederacy, spoke strongly in favor of the action of the Democratic Party and some hands in nominating Greeley, and predicted his success. Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, Mr. Shorter, of Alabama, said that ten years ago he would never have believed it possible that he would stand beneath northern trees, upon northern soil, advocating the cause of Mr. Greeley. He remarked sorrowfully that times weren't as they "used to was," and after the South was knocked into a cocked hat it became necessary to do things that would once have proved very impalatable. Mr. Bird, and Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, followed in terrific strains, and excited the assemblage so strongly that several persons found it necessary to ask the darky at the ice-cream barrel for an additional plate of the cooling mixture. Mr. McRae, of Tennessee, said that he knew Mr. Greeley when he was a Whig, and Democrats; but, he said, he retained the same unruffled expression of countenance and beatific light of feature, as he now presented while seated beneath "his own vine and fig-tree." Mr. Chalmers, of Mississippi, and Col. Anderson, of Missouri, closed the speech-making. The guests took the five o'clock train and reached New-York at 6½. Mr. Greeley rode as far as Fordham and passed the evening at the residence of Mr. Niles.

The following were some of the prominent persons present at the Chappaqua reception: Wendell, Tecumseh Tilson, John Cochrane, Ex-Gov. Hahn, of Louisiana; Mr. Bird, of Massachusetts; Col. Richard Lathers, of Morrisania; Major F. D. M. Spoor, of Georgia; Dr. R. Spaldings, Capt. pk. G. Spalding, of Georgia; George N. Sanders, of Georgia; Eli Shorter, of Alabama; Mr. Waite, of New York; Gov. J. G. Downey, of California; James H. Hardy, of California; Senator Wm. M. Gwin, Joseph C. Wolfskill, W. H. Workman, Henry George, editor San Francisco Post; S. F. Emperwarthof, of California; Mr. Hardman, of Nevada; E. B. Mitchell, of Louisiana; Mr. Newsom, of Chappaqua; Ex-Gov. Dewey, of Wisconsin; Ex-Gov. Magoffin, of Kentucky.

Among the ladies present were Mrs. Greeley, Miss Ida Greeley, Mrs. Geo. E. Walker, Mrs. John Mack, Mrs. Judge White and Miss White.

Excitement in the Greeley Head-quarters Yesterday.

There was some little excitement at the Greeley Head-quarters yesterday. Gen. Cochrane, "Gen." Palmer and several of the Committee had gone on an agricultural "bust" to Chappaqua; but the two or three mild-mannered and elderly gentlemen remained, and were dozing away the still hours in their customary placid manner, when the sudden arrival of the Apache visitors was announced. The advent of so formidable a delegation of notoriously bloodthirsty savages, under the guise of Gen. Howard, known to be an unscrupulous ruffian of the Washington Center, alarmed the mild-mannered gentlemen to that degree that each one who had any hair on his head, involuntarily grasped his scalp lock and rushed for the door of Room No. 14 to seek the protection of the Police guards. Several heavy packages of campaign documents, which were scattered around awaiting frames, rather impeded their progress, and the nonchalant Secretary tripping over one of these, sustained considerable facial damage, while the spectacles were irremediably smashed. Meet, Grant was less unfortunate. Bounding over every obstacle with the speed of a gazelle, he was the first to gain the door; another long carried him half way across the hall and full against a stout gentleman just coming in, who was at once floored by the shock. It was some time before the fallen were righted and the excitement allayed. The head-quarters then became as quiet, not to say solemn, as usual, and the Secretary bought a new pair of spectacles from the itinerant vendor of those articles at the corner.

A Greeley and Brown Fizzle.

An attempt was made at Sing Sing on Thursday evening to get up a Greeley and Brown torch-light procession, but was a most decided failure, as out of 1,200 or 1,400 voters, only thirty or forty men and boys joined in the procession, which was led by H. S. Nelson, A. Walker and C. C. Childs, all prison men, and all the procession, as far as voters were concerned, were prison guards and keepers. As the procession passed the head-quarters of the Grant Club, the followers stopped, and it seemed, would rather look at Grant's banner, which hangs outside, than to follow the Greeley and Brown mob. It was the most disgraceful failure ever seen in Sing Sing.

A Southern Carpet-Bagger.

A Southern carpet-bagger and friend of Jeff. Davis, whose brain has probably been turned by the "liberal" ideas of Horace Greeley, visited the Tribune office, yesterday. He was loud in expressions of friendship for Davis and Greeley, but he was quickly got rid of, as it was thought that the time had not yet arrived for the two advocates of secession to be publicly lifted together. He went over to the City Hall Park, and collecting a crowd around him, made a speech, nominating Jeff. Davis and Greeley. He said that he had "set the wheel a-going at the Baltimore Convention," and had had $17 stolen from his pocket there. The crowd becoming somewhat noisy, a policeman removed the old man from the Park.

Local Politics.

The splendid banner raised on Thursday evening in front of No. 26 Avenue A, by the Grant and Wilson Club, and which was cut down by some evil disposed person, was quickly replaced last evening by Mr. Patterson, the President of the association, and a few friends.

At a meeting of the Young Men's Republican Association of the Fifteenth Assembly District, held at Kromm's Hall last evening, the following gentlemen were elected officers of the Club: President, Col. Wm. B. Avery; Vice-Presidents, Wm. J. Stewart, M. L. Rouse; Secretaries, Benjamin F. Anderson; Delegates to Central Committee, Wm. S. Murray, Robert Stewart, Howard A. Whitfield, O. L. Grammis, Robert Neil, Wm. B. Avery, Jas. H. Hageman, M. L. Rouse.

The Republicans of the Fifteenth Assembly District met last evening at Kromm's Hall, West Thirty-third-street, and formed themselves into a Grant and Wilson Campaign Club. The following officers were elected: President, Robert L. Newton; Vice-Presidents, W. J. Stewart and Samuel Hamilton; Secretaries, James A. Ross, W. S. Murray and George F. Sathery; Treasurer, Robert S. Williams; Sergeant-at-Arms, Patrick W. Curtis.

Arkansas Credit.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Hon. Henry Page, State Treasurer of Arkansas, is now in this City, and states that the report, which appeared a few days ago in several papers, that fraudulent bonds had been found in his office, is entirely false.

The rumor, out of which such partisan capital has been made has the following slender substratum of truth to support it: First—The bonds referred to were altered State Treasurer's certificates of indebtedness. Second—Instead of being paid into the State Treasury

A HARD CASE.

The Story of a Kidnapped Sailor—How American Men-of-War's Men are Made Into British Sailors and the Navy Replenished—Four Months in a Cell—The Law's Delay—No Redress for Enormous Wrongs.

From Our Special Correspondent.

BOSTON, Thursday, July 11, 1872.

A case of hardship, atrocious cruelty and injustice has just come to light in this city which discloses a state of affairs we have thought impossible at the present day. The story of William Kelly, a native of Boston, but lately of San Francisco, as told to a reporter of the Daily Advertiser by himself, bears every mark of credibility, and two of his shipmates corroborate it in every particular, as far as they had an opportunity to witness the occurrences described.

William Kelly, the victim of the lawlessness of a British Captain, was born in Fleet-street, Boston, was carried by his parents to Ireland, at their death, when only ten years old, was brought back to Boston, and for many years has lived on the Pacific Coast. He worked in the mines, and made many voyages as seaman and mate, and lived in San Francisco, working on the wharves. He was thoroughly familiar with the city and though he had heard stories of kidnapping had never been molested up to last December. In his own words, he could "go to a saloon, get drunk and nobody touched him." In December, 1871, he was drugged in a saloon, overpowered by poison, and when he recovered his senses found himself on board the British ship St. James, in the harbor of San Francisco. Many others of the ship's crew had been obtained in the same way. All but three, however, had signed the articles and received advance pay—Kelly and two seamen from the United States ship California, Admiral Winslow. The two latter were drugged and detained until they had been declared deserters, when, knowing they had no witnesses to prove the fact, they were only too glad to ship and escape the penalty. The California has lost, says Mr. Kelly, no less than 280 men by this means since she has been in the harbor of San Francisco. It is by no means the least among many tokens of his truthfulness that he seems quite as anxious that the Government should be informed of the practices to which its seamen are exposed, and the evil remedied, as that his own grievances should be redressed. None of the crew signed the papers in the presence of the British Consul at San Francisco, and his signature as witness was either forged or fraudulently affixed to the register. The men were shipped by the British shipping master, they signed at his office, and none of them ever saw the vessel. The names of Kelly and the two men of war's men, attested though they may be by the British Consul, are no evidence whatever that they signed. Kelly demanded his release, denying that he had signed the articles, and the two men-of-war's men for the additional reason that they belonged to the American Navy. Kelly was still too weak from the effects of the poison on his system to attempt to escape, but was assured that the ship would not sail for some time. One of the other seamen did try to swim ashore, but was picked up and brought back. All remonstrances proved unavailing, and the St. James sailed with the three kidnapped seamen on board.

During the passage Kelly worked as if regularly shipped. He has much to say about the cruelty practiced upon the sailors by the officers, which are horrible enough but do not concern the more important case. Kelly told the Captain that he should report his case to the American Consul at Manila, and finally succeeded in doing so, after he had been several times refused permission to go ashore. The Consul advised him to see what the British Consul had to say about it. Kelly protested that, not being regularly shipped, he had nothing to say about it. Nevertheless he did so, only to find that the Captain had anticipated him. The Consul was suspicious, and began by saying, "Oh, you are the man the Captain has been telling me about!" He said he would try the case, and Kelly protested that the American Consul alone had to do with the case. After seeing him he made up his mind not to return to the St. James, but was arrested by a Spanish policeman and carried on board. A few days after he was taken ashore by the Captain and carried to the British Consul's office. The Consul having asked Kelly what he had to say, he replied, "Nothing," and added, "The American Consul must try the case." The Consul sharply reproved him for this remark, as an insult to himself, when Kelly said that he had not come there of his own accord, and that the Captain had brought none of his witnesses. The upshot of this mock trial was that the Consul said he would give the Captain permission to discharge Kelly if he chose! Kelly then went to the United States Consul to get protection and, at the request of the Consul, told his story to the clerk, who took it down in order to institute further proceedings. On leaving the Consul's office he was arrested by a Policeman, by direction of the British Consul, (who was waiting in his coach for him to appear,) for no offence whatever, kept in irons for half an hour in the lock-up, and then conveyed back to the St. James. Being asked if he would work he replied, "No." He said that he did not belong to the ship and never did, that he had had no pay, and that he would not work. Therefore the Captain caused him to be confined in a narrow apartment—a hatch-house—so low that only two positions were possible—the horizontal, or on the knees, with head bowed low. There was an old sail in the cell, which, while it served as a bed, reduced the height of the apartment. The sail was kept there a month and a half, and then removed. The height of the quarters was 4ft. 4in. feet ten inches; after the sail was three feet two inches, he measured by Kelly with his waist-strap. After the sail was removed, he had only an old carpetbag to lie upon. In this cell he was kept during the entire voyage of four months and six days, on bread and water. Only three times was he allowed to leave it long enough for the hatchhouse to be washed out, and on one of these occasions he believes an attempt was made to poison him by drugging in his absence, some extra food which the steward had consigned to him. The steward had to suffer for his friendship to the prisoner, by being struck by the second officer, at the direction of the Captain. The food made Kelly sick, and when he was ordered the next day to empty the bucket in his cell, he refused because unable to move; whereupon the second mate pulled him out by the leg, and when he fell on his knees, struck him a heavy blow in the back of his head with his fist. The Consul, on complaint being made to him, on no evidence whatever, pronounced Kelly's statement a falsehood. Another of the times when Kelly was permitted to leave his place of confinement, the Captain took occasion to search it, and found in it a board, the margins of which Kelly had made notes, and tore it up in the presence of the victim of his cruelty. During this long confinement the only exercise Kelly could get was by rolling with the ship. His muscles were cramped not only by the narrowness of his quarters, but by the leakiness of the hatchhouse, which caused him to be drenched every time it rained. Of course the cell was dirty, filthy beyond imagination almost. Kelly says that his pluck would not have lived in it very long.

The long voyage at length came to an end. The St. James arrived at Boston June 12. Kelly, hoping to obtain his release as soon as possible, had caused a note to be written to the pilot, asking him to speak to the Harbor Police, stating his case. The Captain tried to prevent the delivery of this note, but Kelly at last managed to hand the note to a sailor, who gave it to one of the men-of-war's men kidnapped with him. The latter handed it to the Captain, pocketed it, and nothing came of it. Two days later he was released and sent ashore, penniless. From the time he was kidnapped he received not a cent of pay, and when he was set at liberty it was without the discharge, to which, if he was a sailor on the St. James, he was entitled.

The story of his efforts to obtain redress in Boston is almost the most disgraceful part of the whole narrative. He began on the day of his release, was sent from one to another in a perpetual round, and he has yet to find a lawyer. The latter put him off, neglected to summon witnesses, did not enter the case at Court, upbraided Kelly because when he was sick one day he did not go to his office to meet the Captain, postponed again, neglected still further, and finally, after the St. James had sailed and redress was impossible, told him that he did not think the case said would have no chance to do with it. The poor man discovered that his oppressor had gone merely by chance on the same day that the lawyer threw up the case, which was the day after the St. James had departed.

The sailors who accompanied Kelly confirm his statements in every particular where they can claim to have been eye-witnesses of his treatment, and their homes are in Boston, so that they know nothing about certain other occurrences, except that they believe Kelly tells the truth. In additional evidence that they are truthful, they say that the Captain used, unceremoniously, to speak of Kelly as his "canary," and they relate incidents that took place on board, showing that the officers made a common sport of the ship. One of these sailors was kicked in the face by the second mate for a trivial offence, if it could have been called an offence at all.

What can be done about this case? Kelly deserves redress, certainly, but he has no money to employ a lawyer; his witnesses who were accessible a week or two ago are rapidly scattering, and the St. James, with its cruel captain, is out of the jurisdiction of the United States.

MILITARY GOSSIP.

The National Guard were on Thursday fully alive to the necessity of being prepared for trouble on Friday, and eager inquiries were made relative to members reporting for duty. Some of the privates went on Friday morning to their armories fully equipped, preferring to be ready before receiving orders, although it was understood generally that if their services were required, they would be summoned by a general alarm on the fire-bells. Fortunately, there was no occasion for the National Guard to turn out; nevertheless, our merchants, bankers and business men should not forget that the citizen soldiery were ready to do their duty when the occasion should arise. Prompt action on the part of the National Guard has been found of great service in times of riot; consequently, when all is peaceful, the ready defenders should be thought of and their organizations kept up.

Company G, Ninth Regiment, N. G., intend going on an excursion to Long Island, near Peekskill, on July 21. Downing's Band is to accompany the party, and a good time is expected.

Companies E and G of the Seventy-first Regiment, N. G., having accepted the invitation to visit Norwalk, Conn., during the present month, have issued a circular to invite the officers and members of the regiment and Veteran Association to join with them. The party will leave New-York on Monday morning, July 22, will be received by Company D, Eighth Regiment, Connecticut N. G., and return on Tuesday evening.

Col. Charles S. Spencer, of the Fifth Regiment, N. G., has got up a medal, as a reward of merit for every Captain who will recruit his command to the maximum strength. The first presentation will take place to-morrow evening.

The annual target practice of Troop B, First Battalion Cavalry, is announced to take place on Saturday next, at Bulmer's East River Park. As the plans for the new armory in Brooklyn for the Twenty-third Regiment, N. G., are now completed. It is expected that the work on the building will be commenced immediately.

Col. Spencer intends to select as his Adjutant the best looking man he can find," provided he is otherwise qualified," at least so says the Colonel himself.

The following named officers have been recently commissioned in the National Guard: First Brigade—Major Rowland M. Hall, Inspector, vice E. Gilon, resigned; Capt. W. W. Mau, Aid-de-Camp, vice R. M. Hall, promoted; First Lieut. W. W. Astor, Aid-de-Camp, vice W. W. Mall, promoted. Third Regiment of Cavalry—Jacob Beyer, Major, vice H. Wisser, resigned; John F. Fick, First Lieutenant, vice F. Bornholdt, promoted; Diederich Borje, Second Lieutenant, vice J. B. Speckies, declined; Joseph Lindauer, Second Lieutenant, vice G. M. Hoff. Fourteenth Regiment—Wesley Julius Sack, Second Lieutenant, colonel, Battery B, First Division—Ernst Foeler, First Lieutenant, vice H. Hillebrand, removed from district. Third Regiment of Infantry—Franklin T. Davis, Captain, vice James B. Spicer, resigned; Daniel B. Horton, Second Lieutenant, vice F. T. Davis, promoted. Ninth Regiment of Infantry—Charles R. Brame, Colonel, vice James Fisk, Jr., deceased; Jacob R. Hitchcock, Lieutenant-Colonel, vice Charles R. Brame, promoted; Dow S. Kittle, Major, vice James R. Hitchcock, promoted. Twelfth Regiment of Infantry—Charles E. Sprague, Captain, vice Knox McAffee, resigned. Fifty-fifth Regiment of Infantry—Charles W. Fluke, Colonel, vice William B. Allen, resigned; Henry J. Beehrer, Major, vice C. W. Fuller, promoted. Eighty-fourth Regiment of Infantry—Charles H. Hankison, Second Lieutenant, vice J. McCandless, deceased; William H. Head, Captain, vice G. E. Helm, resigned. Ninety-sixth Regiment of Infantry—Max Euler, Adjutant, vice F. Seidel, resigned; Otto Meyer, Quartermaster, vice N. Mueller, resigned.

The following resignations have been accepted during the same period: Capt. H. Haman, Fifth Regiment; Lieut. William Merten, Ninety-sixth Regiment; Lieut. Geo. Hillebrandt, Battery K; Lieut. John W. Castree, Twenty-second Regiment; Lieut. Geo. G. Meehan, Seventh Regiment; Lieut. John Burowen, Geo. W. Adams and Alexander Boyd, Eighty-fourth Regiment; Capt. G. A. Fuller, Ninth Regiment; Lieut. John Deering and Michael Gounoud, First Battalion, cavalry.

The election for Brigadier-General to command the Twenty-fourth Brigade, Sixth Division, N. G., has been ordered to take place on Monday, July 29, at the head-quarters in Syracuse. Major-Gen. Hy. A. Barnum is by authority designated to preside at the election.

The current semi-annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New-York, is ordered to convene at the Academy of Music, in the city of Auburn, on Wednesday, July 31, at 11 o'clock A. M.

A sharp order has been issued by Col. Stoenbers, of the Twenty-fourth Regiment, N. G., to the members of his command. It speaks for itself:

HEAD-QUARTERS TWENTY-FOURTH REGT., NATIONAL GUARD, S. N. Y.
TROY, July 8, 1872.

The Colonel commanding has frequently had occasion to commend the regiment for the excellence of its marching and movement on street parades, and he believes the citizens have also in these parades been gratified by their soldierly appearance, drill and discipline. It is therefore with all the more regret that he feels constrained to reprimand the regiment, with the exception of companies G, F and B, for their unsoldierly appearance on the 4th of July, and for the utter absence of discipline among the men on that occasion. The marching and manual of arms were so bad as to reflect seriously upon the whole regiment, and the Colonel feels that the companies upon whom this rebuke is intended must make an effort to redeem themselves for the disgrace inflicted upon the regiment. He will inspect the regiment at an early day, order a special parade of the regiment, and he hereby directs captains and other officers of companies to get their commands in readiness for the parade when it shall be ordered. General Order No. 4, directing uniform not to allow their men to leave the ranks, was not inforced at all. Hereafter all violations of this character will be severely punished. By order of

J. S. SANDERS, Adjutant. GEO. T. STEMBERG, Col. Com.

The Third Regiment of New-Jersey, National Guard, is in a state of disorganization owing, it is said, to the election of Major Rea to the vacant Lieutenant-Colonelcy in opposition to the wishes of the Colonel. The subsequent action of the Colonel has led to the resignation of Major Rea as Major, and his perhaps final departure from the regiment is expected.

It has been decided that only two regiments of the Connecticut National Guard shall encamp this year, and the militia are anxious to know which are the fortunate ones. Gen. Cranford is to make the choice, which is expected to fall on the Third and Fourth Regiments.

The Second Regiment, Connecticut National Guard, are coming to New-York on an excursion trip.

The "City Guard," of Hartford, Conn., (Company F, First Regiment,) propose to go to Fenwier Grove, on Aug. 19, and hold a week's encampment "on their own hook." A daily drill of one hour and a dress-parade at sunset will comprise the actual duty, and the remainder of the time will be devoted to healthy fun.

The Twenty-first Regiment of Poughkeepsie will be handsomely entertained by the Forty-seventh Regiment of Williamsburg on the evening of July 30. They will parade through the principal streets in Williamsburg and Dutchess county, and after the march will be wined and dined at the Armory. On the 31st they will be taken by special train on South-side Railroad to the Seaside House, Rockaway Beach. (What they be provided with coffins if they have the courage to travel on that road?) The surviving members will return to their city to commiserate with their friends—on the S. F. N. train per Hudson River Railroad. The Mayor and Common Council of Poughkeepsie will accompany the "pleasure-seekers." Much fun is anticipated. This entertainment is given to reciprocate the affair enjoyed by the Forty-seventh last year in Poughkeepsie.

Major Fred. Karcher's Battalion of Sharpshooters are making preparations for a grand display on the occasion of the 4th of July, the two Fourth of Julies every month they wouldn't last long. The last one was too much for them. It is reported that at their meeting on the evening of that day every man drank one keg of lager, ate thirty-five pretzels, two bologuas, &c.

First Sergt. Anthony Behlen was elected Second Lieutenant in the Eleventh Brigade Independent Troop.

Daring Robbery in Grand-Street—A Jewel Score Plundered of $2,000 Worth of Watches.

Mr. W. C. Shepherd, proprietor of the large jewel store, No. 622 Grand-street, left his place of business on Friday at 11 o'clock, to transact some business down-town. He customed his shopmate, as usual, to keep the store-door closed. A young man about twenty-eight years old, of dark complexion, with black moustache, wearing a dark coat, vest and light pants, came in to have a collar-stud repaired. In the end of the show-case on the counter, nearest the door, were three trays containing twenty-five gold watches, twenty-seven gold chains, and about one hundred pennyweights of gold rings, in all of the value of $2,000. The young man on leaving the store left the door ajar. The shop assistant noticed this, and closed it. After closing it he went to the back part of the store and sat down. About five minutes after he felt a cold draft, and saw that the store door was open. He closed it, and on looking toward the show-case saw that the watches and chains had been stolen. The Police are looking for the young man who wanted the collar-stud repaired.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Speculations Which Follow the Debate—The Duc de Broglie's Position—The Opposition Strengthening—The Executive's Boldness.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Friday, June 28, 1872.

The many divisions arising from the visit of the delegation from the Right are not yet settled, but on the contrary, show to be more and more accentuated. Letters upon the subject are pouring in from all sides. The Duc de Broglie has written one of three columns and over, full of somber commentaries, and perceptions; in terms of the most perfect courtesy, against the interpretation which M. Thiers put upon the demonstration in question. But beneath an expression which becomes a Prince, as he is in fact, M. de Broglie is very severe upon the President. His appeals to the country to judge between the delegation and M. Thiers—a perfectly legitimate proceeding, by the by—and, beginning with a declaration of confidence, he ends with words so hostile that M. Thiers is reported to have said: "Il veut, il veut, le guerre déclarée!" It is a declaration of war in one sense, and it remains to be seen whether the Duke and his friends can rally supporters enough to make an open attack upon the President. The chances are that he cannot, for M. Thiers wields a more absolute power, that no sovereign since Louis XIV. has conducted the Government in so arbitrary or high-handed manner. I do not say this to complain, for it has long been a theory of mine that France could be governed in neither manner, the same cowardice of her legislators prohibiting, up to this very day, the establishment of a purely constitutional system like that of England. A majority is found to encourage the Duke d'Broglie and his friends, but when it comes to a practical test M. Thiers overthrows the champion of the new movement, and the rest grow suddenly weak in the knees.

DE BROGLIE'S STATEMENT.

The Duc de Broglie writes in language which the Academy can approve, and gives a complete exposé of the interview with the President. He regrets that he has been unable to find, beneath M. Thiers' affected politeness of language, the least intention of applying a remedy to what is believed to be the weakness of his Government. He denies that there was any intention of overthrowing the Republic, or even to enter the field against the President. Believing that the destinies of the country are at stake, and the party of order seriously compromised, the delegation desired to impress upon the President's mind the necessity of leaning upon that party for support, "for," says the Duke, "in a conservative policy resides the last and supreme hope of the country, of internal peace as well as of national independence. Without it there is only shame and ruin, anarchy, bankruptcy, and an indefinite prolongation or renewal of the conquest." Other letters are coming in urging the same views. I latterly spoke of the insurrection in the bureau of the Journal des Débats. This morning that journal gives a rather tart letter from M. Saint-Marc Gerardin, (whom I incorrectly named as a Senator made by the Emperor. It was M. Michel Chevalier and M. Saint who were driven from the Débats, but M. Saint-Marc was made an Academician and had many honors heaped upon him.) The letter asked that his name be withdrawn at once from its editorial list. He gives no reasons, nor need he take the trouble since they are so well known, but M. Leo and M. Dufeuille write more at length and take strong ground against the policy of taking sides with M. Thiers against the Sovereign Assembly. There is a rumor that these gentlemen have been secured by the Courrier de France, Robert Mitchell's paper, but that seems little probable, since the Courrier de France has been considered as one of the semi-official organs, and Mitchell has tried hard for the position not without a show of success. The more likely report is that they will go to the Journal de Paris, the organ of the Orleans Princes, M. Edouard Hervé having left to take a fat office.

THE OPPOSITION STRENGTHENING.

But there is no disguising the fact that this opposition is gaining recruits slowly, and, with the Duc de Magenta in the background, it may become formidable. Great fears are entertained that a conflict may be precipitated today in the discussion upon the Tax bill. With all the ardor of a young legislator, M. Thiers has thrown himself into the contest; he cries from his seat, he interrupts, he contradicts, he rushes into the tribune every few moments to answer some argument, or to get some amendment voted down, and although seeming to yield on some unimportant points, he holds fast to his plan of putting his taxes upon French industry instead of upon acquired capital. Last night, when about to be beaten on a point, the President demanded the floor, and dexterously managed to stave off the vote until today. This evening he will speak again, and, judging from his irritation of yesterday, it is feared that he will try to carry his point either by the aid of that general bogie, Prince Bismarck, or by again threatening to resign.

THE EXECUTIVE'S CONDUCT.

In judging the conduct of M. Thiers many things have to be taken into consideration. It is were certain that a fair majority could be rallied, he would be utterly in the wrong and without excuse. Since the so-called majority can do absolutely nothing—not even protect its own dignity—I for one am quite ready to pardon M. Thiers for treating it badly. As a general rule peoples have just the Governments that they merit, and if not able to govern themselves or to check in any way the usurpations of power on the part of their rulers, it is not for strangers to complain of the absolute means employed. But it is a curious situation, at the best, and reminds one of the battles of ancient times, where a Roman Prince, seeing one of his legions giving way, rushed to its support single-handed, bowled over a whole line of the enemy, and put the army into confusion. M. Thiers does just as he pleases until there is a combination against him, when he goes in for a share and routs the entire party, although it is perfectly evident that if five men were bold enough to form the tortoise by putting their bucklers together and planting themselves firmly, the redoubtable chief could be overthrown. The Constitutionnel declares the present situation the strangest ever known in history, and it is not far out of the way, since on every side reigns nothing but weakness, indecision, doubt and confusion. It says:

"The Supreme Assembly squanders away its sovereignty more and more every day. At the end of eighteen months it has not yet been able to organize its sovereignty, that is to say, to establish a majority. M. Thiers has raised the executive power to such a degree of independence, and while multiplying his protestations in favor of the supremacy of the Assembly, has so inculcated the necessity of his presence, that at the smallest apprehension of his retirement the Chamber thinks everything lost and humbly bows the knee. In not this, in spite of some very marked democratic forms, the consecration of a monarchy, if not, we ask, what is the meaning of the power that has ever been seen? We question ourselves here to stating facts; as to the consequences drawn from them, they are singular enough. They seem pretend that in thus dislocating the two great public powers, in making the national representative subordinate to an executive agent, the Republic is founded. How then would man act if they wished to set up a monarchy? We believe, on the contrary, that in this way people found nothing whatever; the result can only be a hybrid regime, without vitality either for the present or for the future. We have no prejudice against the Republic; we shall accept and support it from the moment when we shall be convinced that it is consolidated by the freely expressed wish of the country. But up to this time this demonstration has been wanting. In every thing that occurs, in all that is said, we see, on the contrary, nothing but mystification." ASHBY.

An Outrage by Soldiers.

Yesterday morning Wm. E. Gough, a carpenter residing in Cottage-place, and employed by Mendenhall & Sigler, of Thirty-third-street and First-avenue, was found at the corner of Thirty-ninth-street and Fifth-avenue, suffering severely from cuts and bruises about the head and body. He was taken to the West Thirtieth-street Police Station, and there stated that while he and another man were working at the new hotel building on First-avenue and Forty-seventh-street, a gang of twenty-five carpenters on a "strike," armed with clubs and pieces of wood, entered the building and made an unprovoked assault upon the two unfortunate men. After he had fallen to the pavement he was kicked in the head and face by the ruffians. Capt. Quinn, of the Twenty-fifth Precinct, was informed of the affair on the spot, and on making an investigation learned that on Friday a party of carpenters who had struck for a second time with the eight-hour movement passed the building and found Gough and his companion at work under the old, or ten-hour system. The strikers ordered them to quit work, but they refused. Early yesterday morning the same party again visited the building, and finding the men again at work assaulted and beat them, and then fled. Neither of the men are seriously injured, and both resumed to work during the afternoon. The perpetrators of this outrage are known, and the Police are in search of them.

BOATING.

A Challenge to Oarsmen in Behalf of the Wards.

The following challenge in behalf of the Wards has been made public:

NEW-YORK, July 13, 1872.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Having documents to testify the claims of some oarsmen of this State as to their ability to defeat Ellis Ward in a single scull contest, I hereby offer to match him against any one in the State of New-York to row a single scull race for $1,000 one thousand dollars a side, at a place to be selected part way between home and home. Allowance is not accepted in two months from the 15th day of August next. I will match two Wards against any two men in the United States, to row a pair-oar race for $2,000 two thousand dollars a side, or more.

DICK RIDDON.

It is to be hoped that some response may soon be received to the above, as the dates on the aquatic almanac are all open at present. The season opened most auspiciously, but it appears that the unusual energy exhibited thus early has exhausted the vitality of our crack oars. Although we hardly look for a reply to the single scull challenge on account of its limit, we confidently expect to hear of an immediate acceptance of the pair-oar proposition. Our New-York sportsmen have a deservedly good opinion of the two justly-renowned Biglin brothers, Barney and John, and, judging from the fastidity manner in which they handled their tools on the Schuylkill course, we should think that Mr. Riddon's offer would not be permitted to go begging long. Should a pair-oared race be arranged between the Wards and Biglins, it will give rowing an impetus which will be felt for the balance of the season, and such a race would mean more to the sport than almost anything which has taken place prior to or since the great regatta at Saratoga.

A meeting had been arranged between Ellis Ward and his friends, and Frank Bell and his adherents, with the view of making a match. It will be remembered that the same parties met on two occasions for the same desire of both, nothing then being accomplished. It now appears that Bell authorized Mr. P. Kelly, of Front-street, to inform Ward that he was ready to make the match, but when the men met, and everything had been agreed upon, Bell demanded six weeks' time, which was at least three weeks more than the time originally decided, and the stake, $500, was too small to repay Ward for the loss of so much time, especially at this stage of the rowing season, when more brilliant engagements cross likely to turn up, and amateur racing crews are constantly requesting his services as trainer, he declined to accede to the demand of the whole time, and this is the second time that the Ward party responded to Bell's call, and Bell retracted his own propositions. It is not likely that Ward will suffer himself to be led into such child's play again.

HONOR AMONG THIEVES.

Two Female Thieves Exhibit a Trait of Honor Not Found Among Members of the Tammany Ring.

On Friday afternoon, Mary Ann Taylor and Ellen Williams, alias Ida Lees, went out walking. Taylor is the wife of "Spectacle Tommy," a noted pickpocket, while Ellen Williams is the relict of George Lees, a deceased burglar. Both the women are accomplished thieves. They stopped at Bradbury Brothers, on the Bowery, and Taylor, recollecting that she wanted to purchase some clothes for an infant of her's, said "let's go in." Passing by the lace counter, the cupidity of the woman Williams was aroused, and although she has not stolen anything for some time in this city, she determined, as she termed it, to "get away with some shawls." She asked Taylor to come over to the counter, as she wanted to look at the shawls. While so doing, she secreted nine lace sacks, valued at $108, under a heavy shawl which she carried on her arm. She was seen, searched, the goods found, and arrested. When arraigned before Tom Coman, in the Tombs yesterday, with her companion, Mary Ann Taylor, Ellen, who is a handsome young woman, created a considerable sensation of astonishment among the Tammany magnates and supporters of Horace Greeley, who were in Court. Although five years in State Prison was staring her in the face, she said and desired that the clerk should take down her statement, which it was done as follows: "I am guilty, but I wish to state that Mary Ann Taylor did not have anything to do with the robbery, and had no idea I was going to steal the lace. I don't know what came into my head to make me do it." Both the women were held.

A Supposed Case of Asiatic Cholera—Autopsy by Dr. Marsh.

A supposed case of Asiatic cholera was brought to the notice of Coroner Young yesterday. It appears that Martin Eltr, aged forty-six, a German scissors-grinder, who lived in a shanty at the corner of Sixty-seventh-street and the Boulevard, was taken sick on Wednesday last and expired at 2 o'clock on Thursday afternoon. During that time the deceased had frequent attacks of vomiting and purging, accompanied by violent cramps in the stomach, thighs and legs. The patient died in a state of collapse, and after death the body became warm, and there were noticed convulsive muscular movements about the diaphragm.

Dr. E. T. E. Marsh, Deputy Coroner, yesterday made an autopsy of the remains, and the following is the result of the examination:

"The face and body of the deceased were of a dusky hue; the features were drawn; eyes sunken and glassy; fingers bluish, contracted and wrinkled; the stomach and intestines contained a whitish, farinaceous fluid, with whitish flakes. The fluid in the smaller intestines was whitish, but in the large ones slightly yellowish. The mucous membrane of the whole alimentary canal was covered with a grayish mucus and the mucous follicles were enlarged; the bladder was contracted and empty; the liver, kidneys and spleen were congested; the right side of the heart was filled with thick black blood; the large vessels of the lungs also contained thick black blood."

In the opinion of the doctor, death was caused by Asiatic cholera.

The Health Department having been notified, the body was removed to the Morgue, and the premises thoroughly disinfected.

Robbed of $40,000 in the Bowery—How a Banker's Nephew Became Intoxicated.

Augustus D. Fitch, of No. 62 Broadway, a nephew of Fitch, the banker, and a young man of means, went into the concert-saloon on the second floor of No. 41 Bowery, on Wednesday evening last, and became intoxicated. He came out and fell asleep on the stairway. Abraham Meyers, eighteen years of 1, of No. 8 Bayard-street, a young thief, who depredates on the Bowery, noticed Mr. Fitch asleep, and robbed him of the gold watch and chain, two finger-rings, his studs, a silver tobacco-box, and $40,000 in bonds of Western and Southern Railroads. While Meyers was robbing Mr. Fitch, Aaron L. Kirk, a crippled beggar who has no residence, watched for the coming of a Police officer. After the robbery was committed Meyers gave the bonds to Charles Miller, a bar-tender living in Broome-street, and Miller buried them. Meyers then gave the watch and chain to Mr. Taylor, a pawnbroker, of No. 63 West Broadway, who pawned it in Simpson's, in Chambers-street, for $40. The rings were pawned by Levy's, in Grand-street, for $4. The studs Meyers wore himself. On Friday evening, Detectives Lyon and King, of the Tenth Precinct, who had been informed of the robbery, saw Meyers standing in the door of a liquor saloon on the Bowery, having Mr. Fitch's studs in his shirt bosom. He was arrested and confessed to the robbery, implicating Miller, McDonald and Kirk, who were also apprehended. The prisoners were arraigned before Justice Shandley, at Essex Market, yesterday, and held for examination. Mr. Fitch, who has been ill since the robbery, and who resides in Greenwich, Conn., will make formal complaint against them on Monday next.

SALES BEFORE THE CALL—12 M.

[illegible]

SECOND BOARD—1 P. M.

[illegible]

SATURDAY, July 13—P. M.

The Bank return this afternoon reflects a steady and easy movement. The Greenbacks are $622,100 in excess of last Monday, and the Gold Notes $562,000 less. The general line of Deposits is up $3,733,100, and the Loans decrease $304,000.

The shipments of Gold today were quite large, and for the whole week about $4,500,000 exclusive of Silver and foreign Coin. This Export demand caused the price of Gold today to rule firm at 114@114¼ ⅌ cent. Bills on London were 109@110 ⅌ cent. (60 days, and 110@110¼ ⅌ cent. short sight. The limited speculation at the Stock Exchange caused a dull demand for Money from the Brokers, and the rates on call were easy at 4@5 per cent.

On the Stock Exchange the Public Funds of the United States were firm in sympathy with the stiffness in Gold. The difficulty among buyers for Europe is to fill any considerable orders on account of the limited offerings. In the Railroad and Miscellaneous Stocks the business of the day was comparatively moderate, although prices as compared with Friday were firm, and the holders disposed to keep out of the market until the return of activity later in the season.

After the Second Board of the Exchange the following quotations were made as against the last figures of Friday Afternoon:

☞ ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY'S FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

Are being absorbed by an increasing demand for them.

Besides being the obligation of a wealthy corporation, composed of men of experience and high-toned commercial integrity, they are secured by a first mortgage on the road, revenues, land grant, franchise and equipments, combined in one mortgage, and are readily negotiable both in the markets of this country and Europe.

A liberal sinking fund provided in the mortgage deed must advance the price upon the closing of the loan. Principal and interest payable in GOLD. Interest at eight (8 p. c.) per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, free of tax. Principal in thirty years. Denominations, $1,000, $500 and $100, Coupons or Registered.

Price 97½ and accrued interest in currency, from Feb. 15, 1872.

Maps, circulars, documents and information furnished.

Trustees—Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York.

The diminished quantity of these Bonds for sale, and the increased demand absorbing them, warrant the belief that they will soon be sought for at an advance considerable above the present subscription price at which they can now be had through the principal houses and bankers throughout the country, and from the undersigned. The substantially record mend them.

90 and ACCRUED INTEREST.

The Road runs from Buffalo to the Detroit River, and is the Eastern link in the new ALL LINE FROM BUFFALO TO CHICAGO, and has been under construction for about two years past by railroad men who have seen the necessity for a STEEL RAIL, LOW GRADE SHORT ROUTE between the great railroad systems which diverge from Chicago, Toledo and Buffalo.

Among the builders of the road, by whose men and contractors 200 miles (out of 230) have already been graded, bridged and made ready for the superstructure, a large part of the steel rails bought, all of the materials for the stations, and a part of the equipment purchased, are:

MILTON COURTRIGHT, JOHN F. TRACY, DAVID DOWS, Wm. L. SCOTT, HENRY FARNAM, R. A. FORSYTH, HENRY H. PORTER, JOHN M. BURKE, M. L. SYKES, Jr., R. P. ALLEN, all directors, either in the Chicago and North-west, or the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific; GEO. OPDYKE, of the Midland Road; JOHN B. ALLEN, SIDNEY DILLON, DANIEL DREW, J. S. GARMENT, J. & J. GAREY, O. S. CHAPMAN, JOHN SOGE, DAVID STEWART, and E. R. WINSTON.

THE ROAD will be

33 MILES SHORTER THAN ANY OTHER ROAD,

either BUILT or in contemplation between Buffalo and Chicago, and will also shorten the distance between Toledo and Buffalo twenty-three miles.

THE MAXIMUM GRADE on the entire line does not exceed FIFTEEN FEET to the mile—and Ninety-six per cent of the road IS STRAIGHT.

THE ROAD WILL BE COMPLETED and in running order on or before Dec. 31 of this year.

The principal and interest of the bonds are payable either in New-York, London or Frankfort.

We confidently recommend the bonds to all classes of investors.

THE SECOND PICNIC.

Eight Hundred and Sixty Poor Children Are Made Happy.

Delightful Trip Up the Sound—Scenes and Incidents—Complete Success of the Excursion.—Large Addition to the Fund —Projected Movements.

The Excursion Fund, for the benefit of poor children, is assuming unlooked for proportions. We have today to acknowledge the receipt of thirty-three additional subscriptions, amounting to the total of $888 25, making the aggregate fund to date $4,498 07. This large sum will no doubt be further augmented, so that we shall be enabled to not only give an extended series of excursions, but organize the home relief on a scale commensurate with the necessities of those children unable to benefit by the excursions. As already stated in these columns, the work of helping sick children is already in a forward state of organization, so that next week the contributors to this fund will see that their money is being used to the best advantage and under a system that cannot fail to be successful, for we intend to publish detailed reports of the work accomplished in that way. The following are the subscriptions received yesterday up to 7 P. M.:

Phelps, Dodge & Co.	$500 00

The Second Excursion.

The second picnic of the series inaugurated by the TIMES, through the generous subscriptions of its readers, took place yesterday morning. The Children's Aid Society marshaled for the excursion 860 children of five schools which have sprung into being under its care. As early as 7½ o'clock the little ones of the German School, with the night mission attached to it, of the Water-street School, of the Eleventh Ward School, of the Thirteenth Ward School, which is also a lodging-house for boys, and of the Avenue C School, were mustered at their respective institutions and marched down to the pier at the foot of Eighth-street and East River. Here they waited for some time, because the tug and the barge that were to convey them to Oriental Grove, on the placid waters of the Sound, had not yet put in an appearance. So they halted passively within the shadow of the great walls of the iron-factories close to the pier. The little girls stood quietly, showing their delight only in their faces, but the boys were irrepressible. They were boiling in their skins with rapture, and performed perpetual fandangos of the most frenzied description, illustrative of their feelings. There was a great contrast between their appearance and the trim show made by the girls. Anxious mothers had toiled half the night to wash and iron the frocks, and had certainly spent a few quarters for ribbons and hats, so that their little girls might look as well as other little girls. But the boys were for the most part ragged little urchins, bare-headed, bare-footed, with indescribable shirts and pantaloons. If anybody looked at them they immediately grinned a broad grin, and showed their tickets. Boys would suddenly recognize other boys. "Hello, Slimpsey, has yer got wum?" "Corse I have," would be the rejoinder, and then they would grab each other in a state of rejoicing that could only find vent in bodily exertion, and would wrestle until one or both would come to the ground. Many of these were from the Boys' Lodging-house, in Rivington-street, and others were picked up in the streets by the reporters of the TIMES and by teachers working with the Children's Aid Society. The glad tidings of what was going on flew through the neighborhood like wildfire, and soon a motley crowd of very ragged and miserable-looking children came to gaze at the happy ones that were going a picnicking. When the barge made its appearance, the crowded upon the slip to watch the embarkation, some actually sobbing because they were not going. But when they were asked to go, when tickets were thrust into their dirty little paws, grimy with filth and wet with tears, they shook their heads with anguish, sobbed still more passionately, yet obstinately refused. It may be that these were children of Catholic parents, who were afraid that they might become attached to the kind teachers of the missions, who looked after the recipients of yesterday's pleasure. But let them be comforted, for their turn will come unquestionably among the series of picnics. Should it be found, as probably is the case, that the poor children connected with the excellent Catholic school a will not go except under the auspices of their teachers, then arrangements will be made by which they can profit equally with others by the munificence of the readers of the TIMES.

When the word was passed to the children to enter the barge there was no pushing nor crowding, though the impatient boys clambered like cats up the timbers, and would not wait the slower process by the gangway. In a very few minutes over 800 happy little ones were on board, some on the ascending immediately to the upper tier. The band struck up a lively air, and the youngsters in their glee commenced capering about the deck in every direction, tumbling up against each other, falling down and picking themselves up again, as if a bruise were a matter of course and not to be thought of on so joyous an occasion. "Hey, Johnnie, ain't this prime," shouted a ragged little news vender in a blue shirt and canvas pants to his partner. "You bet, Shorty," was the succinct reply. Little girls came to their teachers with their eyes brimming with tears, and said repeatedly, "Oh, Miss ——, I am so happy." It seemed as if their little hearts were bursting at the expense of happiness opening before them. Accustomed to stifling tenements, to hideous smells, to harsh and unpalatable fare, to the fretful cares of worried mothers, to the blows and abuse of drunken fathers, the present sail on the barge with the prospective delights of the grove, with its swings and its games, the bathing in the pleasant water of the Sound, the sodawater, (pronounced sangwich by the majority,) the palatable lemonade, the ice-water—a rarity, Heaven help them!—is the way as great as any other of the delights; and above all, the ice-cream proved too much for the fervent temperaments, and they cried lustily. But half-full tubs were soon dealt by the attendants out on the deck, the cry was delightful. The sky was exquisitely blue, and golden clouds in grand and fantastic shapes reflected its splendor. Soft breezes, that blown from heaven, played through the giant timbers of the barge and fanned earnestly the excited little cheeks. Every object was a source of amusement and delight. When they came to Blackwell's Island, the place was recognized, and shouts resulted to the fact. Immediately they all rushed over to that side, and began to cheer as they saw the convicts wresting stolidly at the stone works. Many of them looked up but made no sign; but there were others whose hearts had not been quite hardened by vice and crime, and who were touched by the sight of the children. They waved their hands and shouted "good luck," and it may be that the glow which animated their hearts then and warmed them with unselfish sympathy, shall be to them in the future a germ of better things, and a dawning of brighter days. As the barge passed the work-house the children sang a hymn full of shrill sweetness and tender, unconscious pathos, which brought moisture to the eyes of the adults who accompanied them. Then as the barge sailed proudly on and entered the upper passage of the sound, the band struck up again a dancing waltz tune, and the children from the German schools were soon revolving round the deck with the utmost animation.

The whistle sounded and the teachers obeyed the call. A sandwich and a glass of lemonade was to be served to all hands. At once they gathered their flocks together, and ranging them in single file made them march past the refreshment table where the manager and his assistants were delivering out the beverage. Each urchin received his share, and emptying the glass as he passed returned it to the assistants at the other end of the line, and then went off and munched his sandwich with immense satisfaction. They were in the height of their enjoyment when the tug gave a whistle of intimation that it had the barge alongside the pier of Oriental Park.

The sandwiches and cakes provided were now in requisition again, and each child was furnished with three sandwiches and some cake, and then allowed to land. Then what a scene of rejoicing ensued. The little girls rushed pell-mell into the grove, and seating themselves under the maple and shading trees began to chatter and munch with equal rapidity. Not so the boys. With whoops and yells and roars of ecstacy, they charged upon the beach, deposited their provender on rocks, stripped off their rags, and in a trice were striking through the cool green waves with the most delightful abandon. Half an hour was allowed for rest and refreshment, and then the teachers led the way to the dancing-stand, where the band had already stationed itself. Many of the children did not want to dance, but the German children seemed to think that picnics and dancing were synonimous terms. So they went at it with enthusiasm. But by far the greater number preferred the grove and the fragrance which the trees emitted. Here they enjoyed themselves according to their taste. There was a little, pale-faced boy, with no hat, who carried his ticket in his hand all the time, as if it was a talisman which, if he dropped, the whole enchantment would disappear, and he would find himself back in the factory again. He found a square fruit basket, and he filled it with earth and planted in it one of the poor weeds, watering it by filling his little hands from the spring at least a hundred times. There were others, principally young girls, who wandered about with dreamy, ecstatic countenances, who did not join in the plays, but braided themselves garlands of hickory leaves, and sat retired in leafy places with a few chosen companions. But the major part went in for the swings, or for foot-ball, or for Copenhagen, or joined the throng that tried to win candies. This was the way in which the latter amusement was carried on. A square was enclosed with ropes, and in the centre was a stick on which was fastened a basket. Near it stood a beautiful girl, one of the teachers of the mission school, with a box of candies. The aspirants for sweets had their eyes blindfolded, and were given a wand. If they could march up to the basket and hit it squarely they were rewarded by the girl with the candies, who gave them a double handful. This was a very great attraction, and drew crowds, until the candy was exhausted, when the square became a Copenhagen ground, which was also an attraction. The boys having discovered that there were clams, and also oysters, along the beach, quite deserted the grove, and gave themselves up to clamming for the remainder of the stay. Some broke their plunder open with stones, and devoured the delicacies on the spot. Others carried their spoil home to their parents in their hats, which, indeed, were of a kind not easily spoiled.

At 2½ o'clock the whistle of the steamer sounded, and obedient to a decree, the girls left their games, the boys their clamming, and the bathers, with regret, deserted the cool water. As they entered in single file, every one received a glass of deliciously iced lemonade, which evidently went down good if one might judge from the expression on the youngsters' faces. Half an hour afterward the barge started on its homeward way with every child on board, and all in the highest possible spirits. Then the ice-cream came with requisition, and a sancerful was administered to each. It was a funny sight to watch them eating it, for some had never used spoons in their lives, being accustomed to lick it out of the earthen cups of the Chinese peddlers with their tongues. They tried the spoons, however, at first imitating very awkwardly the style of those around them, but finding that they were making but little progress, they tackled the saucers in their usual way. The little girls who had clean frocks on were as careful as possible, and when irrepressible boys jostled their elbows and left stains upon their clothing looked ready to cry. But the sadness was only for a moment, and was soon chased away when they ascended the deck and heard the band play, and began to dance again. Upstairs, also, a fresh provision of sandwiches and cakes awaited them, which made their cup of joy quite full.

When these had been discussed, the band resumed its labors, and dancing recommenced in the wildest spirit of fun. The bigger German girls who wanted to dance retreated to one end of the huge barge, and the rest of the boat was abandoned to the others, who had a regular Saturnalia of frolicking. In the midst of the joyous riot the boat arrived at its dock, and, with sorrowful faces, the children trooped out upon the pier. It was most pleasing to see them congregated there and being formed into squads by their respective teachers. Some of them looked wistfully at the old barge. Others held fast to the tickets that had passed them for the day into fairy-land, and seemed to half expect that the miracle might be performed again. At length they marched off, not a bit wearied or satiated with pleasure, but as talkative and bright as possible, telling each other how many sandwiches they got, and how by coming down the ladder at the end of the barge they had been helped to cakes twice. This was indeed a feat of heroism, and the others listened respectfully. As they disappeared in the distance, some wending their way down one avenue and some another, it was pleasant to reflect that a ray of real human love has penetrated their poor tenement homes, and that the result must be for the good, both of those who received and those who gave. Children who have been ever once face to face with lovely nature will not forget her radiant form, and will, in many a little effort at cleanliness and many a striving after better things, show their appreciation.

The TIMES staff were greatly aided in their efforts for the happiness of the children by Mr. J. W. Griffiths, one of the contributors; Mr. S. B. Crossett, Mr. Chas. O'Connor, Superintendent of the Boys' Lodging-house; Mr. Eli Trott, Superintendent of the Girls' Lodging-house; Mr. Geo. Calder, Superintendent of the Riving-street Lodging-house; Miss A. Stephens, of the German School; Mr. J. W. Skinner, Superintendent of the Industrial Schools; Mr. C. F. Schendelmeier, Mrs. S. A. Seymour, Miss A. V. Dunlap, and Mr. Wm. H. H. Clark, Mr. Chas. E. Lyon, Mr. Wm. Van Vorst, Mr. E. Marsh, M. Moore, A. Johnson, H. Sinnisic, E. J. Rank, Maodonna Lowell, Brown, Gaskelme, and Mr. J. Lovell, who were all attached to the schools of the Society. There were also present in charge of about 100 children of the Columbia Mission, Mrs. B. Mayer, A. Reynolds, C. Mix, R. Stevens, M. J. Young, and Mr. C. Doonch and Mr. A. Doty. The Fellow-officers, E. J. Robinson, J. C. Lonigan, George W. Unnock, and J. H. Yuss, of the Seventeenth Precinct, rendered most efficient service in the care of the children.

The following were the expenses of yesterday's excursion. It must be remembered that we purchased an entire outfit for the tables, in the shape of crockery, spoons, knives, dippers, tubs, buckets and strainers, it being cheaper in the end than to hire them:

Barge and grove	$100 00

BALANCE SHEET.

Amount of fund to date	$4,498 07
Expenses first excursion, July 11, $614 18
Expenses second excursion, July 12,	601 48
Paid Five Points Mission	100 00
Paid Thirteenth Ward Missionary	50 00
	916 40
Cash on hand	$3,581 67

As yet we have paid very little money to those who are visiting the sick children, as they have authority to order supplies in small quantities from local dealers, whose bills we will pay, this being the mode suggested by the missionaries themselves. Each lady and gentleman engaged in the work of visitation will have the control of a small floating fund, for incidental expenses and items.

The next excursion will take place on Friday next, when nearly 1,000 children from the west side of the City, between Fifty-fourth-street and the Battery, will start on one of Mr. Crossett's barges from the foot of Christopher-street, North River. The picnic party will proceed down the river and harbor to Raritan Bay, New-Jersey, landing at Eagleswood Grove. On the following day, Saturday, our fourth excursion for poor children will take place, when fully 700 children belonging to the Wilson Mission and the "Home Schools" will participate. Bands will be provided on both occasions; and as we intend to entertain the children in the most thorough manner on all future occasions, it has been thought advisable to organize a small corps of waiters, in order that those who are in charge of the children may pay their undivided attention to that duty. So far we have been most successful in preventing accidents; but under the new system the chances of mishap will be rendered yet more remote. All the arrangements, from the moment the excursion starts from the wharf until its safe return to the City, will be under the personal supervision of three to four representatives of the TIMES. We have been thus explicit in order that our plans may be fully understood.

Comments of the Press.

The second picnic of the poor children of New-York takes place today. The NEW-YORK TIMES originated the enterprise, and contributions amounting to upward of $4,000 have been received at that office for the purpose. Upward of a thousand children will participate in the pleasures of today. The TIMES is entitled to a hearty vote of thanks for the great interest it has taken in that class of children, who seldom get away from the dirty City to the green fields.—Elizabeth (N. J.) Daily Monitor.

The New-York TIMES is doing a novel and excellent work in raising funds and providing for taking the poor children of New-York on short excursions to the sea-shore or into the woods. So far about $3,600 have been raised, and three or four trips arranged, in which hundreds of the children of the mission schools will participate. The object is one of pure Christian philanthropy, and should be liberally encouraged by those who have means to spare. We believe the honor of this most praiseworthy movement belongs to Mr. George F. Williams, the city editor of the TIMES. He gave his first excursion yesterday. Taking 800 poor children from the Five Points and other places to Far Rockaway, and giving them the first taste of pure country air. There was abundance to eat and joy unbounded. The expense was $614 75—about seventy-five cents to each child. There is money enough on hand to pay for half a dozen more excursions, and one will be made to-morrow.—Jersey City Times.

Since the NEW-YORK TIMES breathed the breath of life into the great movement which swept from place and power Mr. Greeley's present allies of the Tammany thieving Ring, it has done no better work than something upon which it is now engaged—the raising of funds to provide for the children of the poorer classes of the City suburban excursions. Its appeal to the public quickly brought in some $2,000, and on Thursday five hundred and odd little ones, born in the privation and squalor of the tenement-houses of New-York, and reared in suffering and poverty, were granted at least one happy day in their young lives. By steamer and train they were taken to the shores of Long Island, and there, among the woods, and within sight and sound of the ocean, they were permitted to frolic to their heart's content, while an abundance of substantials and delicacies were provided for them. We don't know at anything that could more acceptable to the minds and hearts of those was planned and rendered possible this act of practical benevolence.—Baltimore American.

So long as our eyes teach us that there is quite as great an amount of misery and wretchedness of every sort in our own land, otherwise so fair, as exists in any other country, we can never advocate nor excuse the annual sending away of immense sums of money for the pretended alleviation of the miseries and woes of the poor heathen of Borrio-boola-gha. Believing so thoroughly as we do in the efficacy of "home missions," and that, in this instance at least, the true plan of charity is to "begin at home," such a project as that lately set on foot by the New-YORK TIMES, naturally commends itself to our warmest approval and admiration. It occurred to certain gentlemen of true benevolence in the TIMES office a few weeks ago, that it would be a noble thing to occasionally gather from the slums of the City those poor children who never have a holiday, and to give them an "outing" in the way of a trip to the country, a boat-ride on the Bay, or some other excursion, which should, for a few hours at least, remove them from the lamentable associations of their wretched every day surroundings. The projectors of this admirable plan did not allow their enthusiasm to cool, but they set about forming a subscribing uncle own funds, made their plans known, and appealed for subscriptions from the general public. Can any one, who has in his heart a particle of the spirit of that genuine Christianity which makes all true men love little children, fail to wish such an enterprise God-speed?—Minneapolis (Minn.) Tribune, July 11.

A great deal of sentiment has been occasioned in Mamaroneck in consequence of the sudden death of Mrs. Bridget Edwards, in Washington-avenue, near Waverly-street, as it is alleged, by malpractice. Coroner Weeks made all the investigation he deemed necessary to satisfy his mind that there had been no malpractice in the case.

NEW-JERSEY.

The store of Henry Smith on Cane-street, Orange, was entered by burglars on Friday night and $200 worth of cigars taken.

Mr. Elihu Day, a well-known citizen and a capitalist of Newark, died in that city, yesterday. Mr. Day was at one time a member of the Assembly, and for a long time was President of the Newark Savings Institution.

The defense in the cases of Messrs. Hanson, Velleau and Robertson, charged in the indictments with conspiracy to defraud the City in having advanced the salaries of the Captains in each of the precincts beyond the amount specified in the charter, the extra amount, it is alleged, having been refunded and used for political purposes. The Commissioners were acquitted, two weeks ago, to the payment of $100 fine each, and were of course disfranchised, having been convicted of felony. The justice of the conviction and sentence was thoroughly canvassed at the time, all the men being prominent business men of high character, and it never having been charged that any personal use had been made of the moneys taken. The question immediately arose as to the ability of these men to still perform Commissioners, and Gov. Parker, upon whom the appointment of a new Board would devolve in the case of the removal of the old one, demanded an opinion of the Attorney-General. This opinion is in favor of the removal of the old Board, and under it Gov. Parker will probably take the responsibility of appointing a new Board, to serve till next April, when the term of the Legislature expires.

Mr. Gladstone declares that as all public offices are held upon the implied condition of a faithful performance of the duties of such offices, they are forfeited and made vacant without any supplementary proceedings, immediately upon conviction of a crime contrary to the duties of the office, or for other crime, if it be infamous. The sentence of office is ipso facto. No writ of ouo warranto can be granted since it is inapplicable, but any additional proceeding must be in the form of an inquest of office to ascertain its forfeiture, or a writ of scire facias, to show cause why the office shall not be seized into the hands of the person having the power of appointment, or to repeal the grant of office. The record of an indictment and conviction for an offense against the duties of an office, or an infamous offense, together with the record of appointment, are equivalent to an inquest of office and establishes a vacancy. In its application to the Police Commissioners, then it is necessary to establish the identity of the parties named in the record of appointment, and the record of conviction to establish such a vacancy.

The Attorney-General goes on to show this identity, and also that the crime of which a conviction was had was one both against the duties of the office, as the Police, and the City of whose interests they were the guardians, and an infamous crime, as they are deprived of the right to appear as witnesses and lose the elective franchise. He concludes by saying: The office of both of those appointed was undoubtedly forfeited and vacated by the commission of the crime, and the forfeiture and continued vacancy is duly established by the proper record evidence, except in the case of Hutton, whose office expired, became vacant and was filled by the term meeting before the proper evidence of the forfeiture and vacancy of his office became vacant.

In place of Commissioners Hutton, Mr. Jacob Marinus was appointed a member of the Board, and he alone of the members will be able to continue in office under this ruling of Mr. Gladstone. What effect this decision can have on the condition of the city cannot be known. Since the sentence the Board has met and transacted their regular business, including the appointing, suspending and dismissing them from the force. It is extremely doubtful if business thus transacted can stand, and the city affairs may be thrown into a bad condition, and the city may possibly be left with an unpaid Police force or without any. The members of the Board, however, maintain their right still to act, and will contest the matter against any new Board that may be appointed.

A Suit Against a German Catholic Priest for Slander.

Mr. F. W. Schloss, a German tailor, residing at Union Hill, has commenced suit against Father Barnard, a priest of the German Catholic Church in that place, for slander, laying the damages at $5,000. Schloss is a parishioner of Father Barnard's, and has been President of a Catholic Benevolent Society. The funds of this Society were expended by Schloss by the priest for the purposes of the church, but he declined to turn them over, claiming that he could not do so without an order from the Society. On the succeeding Sunday, it is alleged, Mr. Barnard arose in the pulpit after each service and denounced him to the congregation as a "rascal and a swindler," and charged the congregation the report that Schloss was a Freemason, and induced a number of his shop-girls to leave him upon false representations.

Departure of Johann Strauss for Europe.

Johann Strauss, the famous composer and orchestra leader, took his departure for Europe yesterday afternoon, on the steam-ship Donau, of the North German line. Herr Strauss received a large number of friends at the Clarendon Hotel this morning, among whom were many of our principal musicians. A few minutes after 12 o'clock he made his appearance on board the vessel, accompanied by his wife. He was shortly afterward joined by Count Arco, of the German Legation, who was followed by Mr. Boleslawsky, Secretary of the Austrian Legation at Washington, and Mr. Rosen, the agent of Mme. Pauline Lucca and Mr. Strauss for this country. Mr. Strauss shook hands heartily with both these gentlemen, and expressed deep regret at leaving so many friends in the United States.

Mr. Strauss said that he bade farewell to the people of the United States with the kindest feelings. He should always remember this country with delight, especially the City of New York, of whom he spoke very enthusiastically, calling it a "second Paris." He expressed a desire to once again publicly thank the Press in general for the courtesy and good-will it had invariably extended toward him since his advent at the Boston Jubilee.

Speedy Restitution.

John Murphy, a wagon thief, was brought into the Tombs yesterday morning, charged with having attempted to steal a piece of cloth from the store of C. H. Blake, No. 97 Franklin-street, at 10½ o'clock. About an hour after the attempted theft, Murphy was convicted at Special Sessions, and sentenced to six months imprisonment. On being removed he said, "Judge, this is speedy retribution."
